Again, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania should say that the language of the law is so clear in this case that there will be no opportunity for misconstruction of it, I would call the gentleman's attention to the fact that no section of the organic act is so plain in its language as section 75, which prohibits the ownership of more than 2,500 acres of land by corporations and declares it unlawful for any member of a corporation engaged in agriculture to be in any wise interested in any other corporation engaged in agriculture. Yet the recent investigation of the Insular Committee of the interior department of the Philippine Islands, conducted by the gentleman himself, has disclosed the fact that the letter and spirit of that section has been of no consequence in so far as preventing the Sugar Trust from owning about 65,000 acres of land in one tract in Mindoro.

Let me refresh the memory of the gentleman on this subject.

Mr. OLMSTED. The gentleman from the Philippines can not refresh my memory on that, because the Sugar Trust does not own an acre of land in the Philippines.

Mr. QUEZON. Well, the late Representative from Kansas, Judge Madison; the gentleman from Iowa, Judge HUBBARD; and the gentleman from Minnesota, Judge DAVIS, in their report on that investigation, said that those lands were not acquired by the Sugar Trust, but by "its next-door neighbor." [Laughter.]

Mr. OLMSTED. That is different.

Mr. QUEZON. I admit that there is some difference between my language and that used by the gentlemen whom I cited, but it is only in the form. The facts disclosed in that investigation, Mr. Speaker, are these. No sooner had the Payne-Aldrich bill been passed, which permitted the entrance into this country of 300,000 tons of sugar, free of duty, from the Philippines, than Mr. Welch, a man engaged in sugar business in Hawaii, Cuba, and Porto Rico; Mr. Havemeyer, a stockholder of the Sugar Trust; and Mr. Senff, a man who has been vice president of that trust, tried to acquire sugar lands in the Philippine Islands for the purpose of taking advantage of that tariff. They sent a man down there by the name of Poole, who bought from the Philippine Government the friar land known as the San Jose estate of 55,000 acres. As soon as these lands were acquired, the same gentlemen, Mr. Welch, Mr. Senff, and Mr. Havemeyer, organized the Mindoro Development Co. for the purpose of establishing a sugar central on that estate.

But the estate was 12 miles away from the only available harbor—the Bay of Mangarin—and this fact was an obstacle to the speedy and convenient transportation of the manufactured sugar from the factory to the market. The land lying between the estate and the bay was of the public domain of the Philippine Islands and it had an area of about 9,000 acres, an amount of land which they could not acquire by themselves under the law. Such expert sugar business men as these gentlemen are, who had experience in operating large sugar plantations in Porto Rico, where only 500 acres is the maximum allowed to be owned by corporations, were not of course going to be stopped in their new enterprise by such a small thing as the land and corporation laws of the Philippines. What did they do to acquire these public lands in spite of these laws? Nothing less than to organize three corporations in California, the stockholders of these corporations being the wife, brothers-in-law, relatives, and employees of Mr. Welch, the directing mind of the whole affair. These corporations, through the same man, Mr. Poole, who bought for Messrs. Welch, Senff, and Havemeyer the San Jose estate, purchased the public land desired, which, at the same time that it provided a means of communication between the San Jose estate and the bay, enlarged by several thousand acres more the area of the already immense San Jose estate.

Thus we have the sugar central of the Mindoro Development Co., owned by Messrs. Welch, Senff & Havemeyer, and managed by Mr. Poole, built for the purpose of manufacturing the cane raised on the San Jose estate and on the land of the three California agricultural corporations. Then the San Jose estate, owned by Messrs. Welch, Senff & Havemeyer, purchased through Mr. Poole and managed by Mr. Poole, for the purpose of raising cane to be manufactured by the Mindoro Development Co., and then the three California agricultural corporations, composed of the wife, brothers-in-law, relatives, and employees of Mr. Welch, whose lands were acquired through Mr. Poole and are managed by Mr. Poole, and are dedicated to the raising of sugar cane for the Mindoro Development Co., and to affording a right of way to the railroad which will transport the manufactured sugar from the San Jose estate to the Bay of Mangaring.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if these combinations are not a clear evasion of the land and corporation laws of the Philippines, which prohibit the ownership of more than 2,500 acres of land by a corporation and declare it illegal for the stockholders of one agricultural corporation to be interested in any shape or manner in any other agricultural corporation; if these facts which I have related and which are admitted as proven by all the members of the Committee on Insular Affairs, without a single exception, are not an evasion of those laws, then I want to know what would be an evasion of those laws. In fact, the whole transaction was not merely an evasion, but a violation of those laws. Note, Mr. Speaker, that the conclusion which all of us must derive from the stated facts, to wit, that the same men own the sugar central, the San Jose estate, and the three California corporations is admitted by Mr. Welch himself the moving spirit of the enterprise.

Here is what Mr. Welch said, declaring before the Committee on Insular Affairs on the investigation I am alluding to:

> As far as the San Jose estate and the Mindoro Development Co. are concerned, there is a mighty close community of interest. We are practically the same; there is no getting away from that.

[Laughter.]

And answering a question about the three California agricultural companies, he said:

> Yes; we are quite a family party.

[Laughter.]

Is it not evident, Mr. Speaker, that the provision of the land and corporation laws of the Philippine Islands meant nothing to "quite a family party," which was determined to own, hold, and operate from New York and San Francisco 66,000 acres of land in one tract?

Mr. JONES. Fifty-six thousand.

Mr. QUEZON. Including the California corporations, it is 66,000 acres.

What became of that wise policy of Congress of eradicating the system of absentee landlordism, and wherefor we bonded ourselves for $7,000,000? Perhaps some one may think that we are improving in our condition, for, instead of religious orders, our new landlords are society men, magnates of Wall Street. But Judge DAVIS, from Minnesota, and Mr. MORSE, from Wisconsin, Republican members of the Insular Committee, do not take this view. They say:

> The masters in place of being high-minded religious monks will be sugar lords, residing in America, and through their superintendents and foremen they will reduce the inhabitants of the lands to a condition of servitude.

Mr. Speaker, the beauty of the investigation, which we owe to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN], is that Congress has had an opportunity to see with its own eyes how the organic act has operated in the Philippines in so far as preventing the exploitation of the islands by absentee landlords. It will be interesting for the Members to hear what Senator Teller said on this subject in 1902, discussing the effect of the provision of the organic act, which prohibits the ownership of more than a certain number of acres of land by corporations. At that time the limit contained in the bill was 5,000 acres. Let me read the remarks of the Senator.

> I want some one to tell me why a corporation should be permitted to take 5,000 acres of land there. If one corporation can take 5,000 acres, 10 corporations might each take 5,000 acres, and a hundred corporations might each take 5,000 acres. There is no limit to the number of corporations that may go there, and after they have taken the land and got their title, if they should conclude to form a combination, they could do that, I suppose, although there is a provision here which says "This provision shall be held to prevent any corporation engaged in agriculture from being in any wise interested in any other corporation engaged in agriculture." That, I suppose, was put in the bill as a sort of sop to the people who might be afraid of consolidation; but there is no man living in this day who has given any attention to the affairs of our country for the last two or three years who does not know that it will amount to absolutely nothing, and that if 50 corporations, having each 5,000 acres, should conclude to enter into a combination, they could do it in spite of all the Filipinos and all the United States besides.

It would, I am sure, gratify Senator Teller to know that by these remarks he has acquired a good title to be called a prophet, except that although he foresaw the possibility of combinations being made by companies after they had acquired these lands from the Government, he had not suspected that such combinations could be made before the purchase of the lands, for he always took it for granted that the Philippine Government would not, on the face of said combinations and the injunction of the law, dare to sell said lands to these corporations.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. QUEZON. Yes, sir; with pleasure.

Mr. MANN. In reference to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, which recommended the purchase of 40 acres by an American citizen, can the gentleman inform the House whether there has, in his opinion, been any violation of the law or the spirit of the law concerning the sale of 40 acres to persons who must occupy it for five years?

Mr. QUEZON. I do not know that there has been any violation so far. It has not been necessary. It has been easier and more effective and, no doubt, more profitable to violate the law concerning corporations.

Mr. MANN. The amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania does not affect at all the question of corporations, nor does the report of the bill affect the question of the purchase by corporations, which, I should agree with the gentleman, ought to be controlled. The gentleman says there may be an evasion of the law in reference to the sale of 40 acres, and cites what may be true—I do not know—an evasion of the spirit of the law by corporations. But, after all, what has that to do with this proposition?

Mr. QUEZON. I stated these facts merely to show how careless the Philippine Government has been in enforcing the land policy of this Government in the islands. If that was so when such policy was so strict as to prohibit the ownership of public lands by American citizens, what would the Philippine Government do when they see, from the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that Congress has adopted a principle with regard to the disposition of public lands in the Philippines opposite to the one pursued so far? The Philippine Commission would undoubtedly construe this action of Congress as indicative of a disposition to fall in line with its wishes on the matter.

Mr. MANN. Of course, that might be a matter of construction. Will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. QUEZON. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. Do I understand that the organic law referred to prohibits, in the gentleman's opinion, an American citizen from purchasing 40 acres of land, but permits an American corporation to purchase 2,500 acres of land?

Mr. QUEZON. I do not think I quite understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. MANN. Do I understand the gentleman's construction of the organic law to be that the law does not permit an American citizen to purchase 40 acres of land which he may occupy himself, but does permit an American corporation to purchase 2,500 acres of land?

Mr. QUEZON. I do not believe that the law permits an American corporation to purchase 2,500 acres of land, but it has been allowed by the Philippine Government.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman say that the organic law does not permit an American citizen to purchase 40 acres of land?

Mr. QUEZON. Yes, sir; I do; nor does it permit an American corporation to purchase or lease 2,500 acres.

Mr. OLMSTED. Oh, I think the gentleman is entirely mistaken about that.

Mr. QUEZON. Well, that is a matter of construction, and I am not going into a legal discussion now. It is a question of opinion, and the gentleman's and mine seem to be generally at variance.

Mr. MANN. I will say that if the law does not permit an American citizen to purchase 40 acres of land, which he may cultivate himself and live upon, but does permit an American corporation to purchase 2,500 acres, then we ought speedily to amend that law.

Mr. QUEZON. When the organic act does not permit an American citizen to acquire 40 acres of land, it is inconceivable that it shall allow an American corporation to acquire 2,500 acres. That would not be consistent, and Congress is very consistent in its legislation.

Mr. MANN. That is very complimentary, but I am not sure that it is always correct.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUEZON. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNER. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the present Government of the Philippines was not disposed to act in the interest of the Filipino people?

Mr. QUEZON. I did not say so. I said that the Philippine Government does not sympathize with the policy of Congress regarding the disposition of the public domain in the Philippine Islands. Said Government does what it thinks the law ought to allow and not what the law does allow.

Mr. TOWNER. But is it not true that the Philippine Government is composed at least in part of the Philippine people themselves?

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit me just one word there?

Mr. TOWNER. I do not know that it is necessary for the gentleman from Virginia to come to the rescue of the gentleman from the Philippines. He seems to be able to take care of himself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUEZON. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman will not object to my making this remark, because I wanted to suggest it a week ago. I think the gentleman was then laboring under a misapprehension. During the remarks of the gentleman a week ago he asked if those lands which were in the non-Christian Provinces were not entirely under the control of the Philippine Commission and those in the Christian Provinces under the control of the legislature. What I wanted to say to the gentleman is this: I think he was entirely correct as to the general proposition that the Philippine Commission has charge of the affairs of the non-Christian Provinces and the legislature of the Christian Provinces, but we have spoken of the Philippine Commission disposing of these lands. The commission is not disposing of them. It is the secretary of the interior. The commission is not doing it at all. The secretary of the interior and the director of lands in his department are disposing of these lands. The commission as a commission has nothing in the world to do with the lands either in the Christian or the non-Christian Provinces. It is one of the branches of the legislature, and I think the gentleman was laboring under a misapprehension the other day when he asked that question, and I desired to explain it to him.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from the Philippines will permit this statement in his time——

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Iowa will allow me, I desire to answer his question in addition to what the gentleman from Virginia has said. As I stated a few days ago, the Philippine Government is not really controlled by the Filipino people, but, on the contrary, it is practically controlled by the Philippine Commission, which is appointed by the President of the United States without the advice, much less the consent, of the Filipino people.

Now, the gentleman ought to know that while there may be some ground for the assertion that the Philippine Legislature is composed, at least in part, of the Filipino people themselves, there is not the least foundation for the assertion that the executive power of that government is shared in any wise or manner by the Filipino people. My complaint is that the executive branch of the Philippine Government is not carrying out the policy of Congress, or in other words, is not executing the provisions of the organic act regarding the disposition of Government lands in the Philippine Islands. To be more specific, my complaint is directed against the Secretary of the Interior, who is the head of the department responsible for the administration of Government lands in the Philippines, the Hon. Dean C. Worcester, and the Director of Public Lands, Mr. Sleeper. The Filipino people had nothing to do at all with the appointment of these gentlemen, and if they could they would have long ago removed both of them from their respective positions. Secretary Worcester is the most unpopular official in the Philippine Government, and has been so for a long time. During the last two years he has become obnoxious to the Filipinos owing to some uncalled-for remarks, which he made publicly, reflecting upon the character of the people at large. Besides, his suit presented against the editors and owners of the newspaper El Renacimiento for libel, and wherefore he got many thousands of dollars from the defendants while the criminal case is still pending of appeal before the Supreme Court of the United States, has belittled him in the public eye. The article published in that paper, which Secretary Worcester denounced as libelous, as compared with the articles we read every day in the newspapers of this country denouncing public officials, would read like a praise, and yet in the Philippines, where we are supposed to have the same freedom of the press that you have here, but where the judges are appointed and kept in office at the pleasure of the Philippine Commission, an influential member of which Secretary Worcester is, that article caused the ruin of all the owners and editors of El Renacimiento and the conviction of the editors.

Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate for the Filipino people, and equally unfortunate for the United States, that the man in charge of the most important department of the Philippine Government, the interior department, the department to which the care and administration of the natural wealth of the islands is intrusted, is a man who does not believe in the wisdom of the policy of Congress regarding the disposition of that wealth, and who has antagonized the people whose interests he is supposed to look out for.

I have nothing personally against Mr. Worcester. While even among Americans in the Philippines there are complaints against his lack of tact in dealing with the public, he has treated me with courtesy whenever, officially or personally, I had something to do with him. In fact, I am one of the few Filipinos who has been honored by being complimented in two official reports by the Secretary of the Interior. I mention this in order to disabuse the mind of anyone who may believe that I have any personal grievance against Mr. Worcester. I admit that he has a wonderful mind and is a hard-working man, but I can see very little benefit for the Filipino people to be derived from his industry and intellectual equipment, when the people have no confidence in him, when the people, rightly or wrongly, are convinced that he is not working for their welfare, and when, at least, in the administration of Government lands, it has been evidenced—what he has never tried to conceal—that he is not in accord with the policy of Congress and has not been very particular in executing it.

Mr. Speaker, I sincerely hope that the War Department may, at last, take notice of the fact that it is utterly impossible for this Government to carry out successfully the administration of the islands when the appointed officials are not supported by the Filipino people, much less when they become plainly objectionable to them. I have been urging for the last year that Secretary Worcester may be permitted to retire from his present position, with no avail. The War Department's position is that Mr. Worcester is an honest and competent man and that the opposition to him of the Filipino people, due to his lack of tact, is not a sufficient ground for asking his resignation. This view of the War Department is, I believe, wrong. Tactfulness is needed in a man if he is to be a successful administrator as much as any other quality. A public official is a servant of the people, and he ought to know how to treat the people. Secretary Worcester has been a member of the Philippine Commission ever since the occupation of the islands, and he has been so long accustomed to exercise an executive authority that I am afraid he has become a ruler.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, let me make this statement in regard to the matter. The administrative officers of the Philippine Government are under the direction and control, first, of the law, the organic law, which prescribes:

> That these lands may be held, sold and conveyed, or leased temporarily for a period not exceeding three years after their acquisition by said government on such terms and conditions as it may prescribe, subject to the limitations and conditions provided for in this act.

That gives the Philippine Government absolute power to dispose of those lands. If it is disposed of by the executive officers of the Philippine Government, they must act under the power which the Philippine Government has, composed not only of the commission selected by the Government of the United States, but by an assembly which is selected by the Philippine people themselves, and these lands can not be disposed of unless it shall be by the affirmative act of the lower branch of the Philippine Legislature. And that is the trouble with the gentleman's whole theory. Will the gentleman pardon me for another question?

Mr. QUEZON. Yes, sir; gladly.

Mr. TOWNER. I understood the gentleman to say that the law was being evaded which prescribed that no part of the public land shall be sold except in limitations of 40 acres to an individual. I was correct in that, was I not?

Mr. QUEZON. No; did I say that the law which limits the sale of public lands to 40 acres to an individual has been evaded?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. QUEZON. I did not say so, unless the gentleman refers to my contention, seemingly admitted now by everybody as being correct, that the Philippine Government, in permitting Americans to buy 40 acres of land, violates that law.

Mr. TOWNER. I understood the gentleman to say so.

Mr. QUEZON. I spoke of the evasion of the law which prohibits the ownership of more than 2,500 acres of land by corporations.

Mr. TOWNER. Well, it make no difference; it is the provision of the general law with regard to the disposition of the public lands, and the gentleman said that the law has been evaded in the instance where these individuals who were related to the persons who had acquired 50,000 acres and who had also acquired, by a violation of the law, some 7,000 acres besides. Was I correct in so understanding?

Mr. QUEZON. I said, Mr. Speaker, that the late Judge Madison, of Kansas, Judge HUBBARD, and the gentleman from Minnesota, Judge DAVIS, are of that opinion, and that I agree with them. I will read to the gentleman what they say about it.

> The San Jose incident is one that should stand as a warning both to the Philippine Government and to the United States. Mr. Welch had no sooner acquired the San Jose estate for himself and immediate associates than he caused to be organized what was described in the majority report as the California corporation.
> The stockholders of these corporations are made up of his wife, brothers-in-law, business associates, and clerks. Of course, he is the dominating figure, and by the community of interest that is apparent in the situation there is, to all practical intents and purposes, a holding of about 62,000 acres of Philippine land by one person. It is possible that Mr. Welch and these California corporations and their stockholders have violated the inhibitions of section 75, against members of one corporation engaged in agriculture being interested in similar corporations, and in the light of the testimony developed in this hearing that matter should have the attention of the Philippine law officers.

And on this same question the minority report says:

> Considering these astounding facts, it is difficult to escape the conclusion that the land laws of the Philippines are being evaded in a most shameless manner.

[Applause.]

Mr. TOWNER. Now, if I may be permitted, I would like to have the gentleman say whether he is not now asking that these lands should be put under the same provisions that were thus evaded in the instance of which he spoke. In other words, he is asking that these friar lands shall be subject to the same laws that he says have been thus easily evaded in the instance that he mentioned. Is that true?

Mr. QUEZON. I am asking that the laws which regulate the sales of public lands and which, in my opinion, already regulate the sales of friar lands, be specifically applied to the friar lands in order to avoid further contention. But I am not asking that because those laws have been evaded in the case of public lands that they also be evaded in the case of the friar lands. [Applause.]

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly; I did not understand that the gentleman was asking that the land laws be evaded, but he is asking that these lands shall be placed under the same laws which were thus evaded.

Mr. QUEZON. Yes, Mr. Speaker, with the hope that by Congress taking this action, the Philippine Government will understand clearly that Congress meant to enforce its law in the Philippines with regard to the disposition of Government lands. That is my main object. I want this Congress to do something which will remind the Philippine Government that when Congress enacted the organic act, trying to prevent the sale of Government lands in large tracts, it did so, knowing what it was legislating for, and meaning that this legislation should be complied with by those in charge of the execution of the laws in the Philippines. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman a question——

Mr. QUEZON. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. For information which very likely has been answered before, as I have not heard all of the debate. In the cultivation and production of sugar in the Philippine Islands is it necessary to have large tracts consolidated under one management?

Mr. QUEZON. I do not think so, Mr. Speaker. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] repeat his question?

Mr. MANN. I simply wanted to know, in the opinion of the gentleman, whether tracts of land held in small areas are available for the profitable production of sugar.

Mr. QUEZON. I think so. I believe that the sugar industry in the Philippines could grow without the necessity of selling Government lands in large tracts. In the first place, there are already in private ownership all the land needed to produce over 300,000 tons of sugar, which is the maximum of sugar that we can produce now with profit. If gentlemen who want to establish sugar centrals in the Philippines will establish them in the Provinces where the cane sugar is being raised by the Filipinos themselves, they would have enough cane for all the sugar that their central could manufacture every year, with profit to themselves and benefit to the people. In fact, Mr. Speaker, while I was in the Philippines, two years ago, I learned that the farmers of Negros were anxious to enter into an agreement with some one who would establish a sugar central in that Province to supply him with all the cane he wanted. I even favored the idea of having a sugar central established and operated by the Philippine Government, in a given territory wherein there are many small sugar-land owners, with a view of teaching these farmers the modern system of manufacturing the sugar, and later on selling the central to them.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to take much more of the time of the House, but I wish to——

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman a question along that line. Is it desirable that large sugar plantations should be established in the Philippine Islands at the present time or in the near future?

Mr. QUEZON. I do not think so, Mr. Speaker, and I have already expressed my opinion on the subject.

Mr. FOWLER. Is there not another crop which produces a larger income—to wit, copra—than sugar does to the tiller of the soil?

Mr. QUEZON. Yes, sir.

Mr. FOWLER. How does the income of the copra compare with the income of sugar on 40 acres of land?

Mr. QUEZON. There is no comparison.

Mr. FOWLER. Which is the greater?

Mr. QUEZON. The copra.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. QUEZON. Yes, sir.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit me to answer the question which was asked of him by the gentleman from Illinois as to whether it is advisable to have large sugar plantations in the Philippines? I quote from what the Secretary of War said in a report to President Roosevelt on January 23, 1908:

> Nor would I regard it as a beneficial result for the Philippine Islands to have the fields of those islands turned exclusively to the growth of sugar. The social conditions that this would bring about would not promise well for the political and industrial development of the people, because the cane-sugar industry makes a society in which there are wealthy landowners, holding very large estates with most valuable and expensive plants and a large population of unskilled labor, with no small farming or middle class tending to build up a conservative, self-respecting community from bottom to top.

That is also what the Committee on Insular Affairs thought in 1902 when they presented this bill. That is what everybody thinks who has really at heart the welfare of the people of the Philippine Islands.

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Speaker, if what I have said has given the impression that I accuse the Philippine Commission of dishonesty of purpose in administering the affairs of the islands, I wish to efface that impression before taking my seat. I believe that it would be unjust to the commissioners to say that they mean to injure the Filipino people. I believe that they are doing what they think is the best for the Filipinos, and I am glad to add that, as a rule, the officials of the Philippines are of a high moral character. But it is not the question whether they mean well or not. My contention is that they have no right to determine what the policy of the United States in the Philippines shall be, for this is exclusively the right of Congress, and that it is the duty of the insular officials to execute faithfully and strictly the will of Congress.

After all, no one who is familiar with the history of colonial governments ought to be surprised to learn of the manner in which the act of Congress has been complied with in the Philippines by the Philippine Government. Colonial governments are by their nature essentially wrong, and sooner or later they degenerate into a government of man instead of a government of law. The instance of the officials in the islands, doing what they think the law should be and not what the law is, is an illustration of this fact, and the more emphasis is put upon the wisdom and honesty of those officials the better this instance illustrates the theory of that great statesman, John Stuart Mill, who said:

> The government of a people by itself has a meaning and a reality, but such a thing as a government of one people by another does not and can not exist. One people might keep another as a warren or preserve for its own use, a place to make money in, a human cattle farm to be worked for the profits of its own inhabitants; but if the good of the government is the proper business of a government, it is utterly impossible that a foreign people should directly attend to it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is one more point that I wish to make in connection with the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

It is a good economic principle, universally admitted, that public lands should not be disposed of to foreigners. As Americans residing in the islands are not, according to the organic act, citizens of the Philippines, they are consequently foreigners. This being so, they ought to be excluded from the acquisition of public lands in the islands as much as any other foreigner. It must be borne in mind that although the Philippines are actually under the sovereignty and control of this Government by virtue of the treaty of peace with Spain, they have not been declared a permanent territory of the United States; but, on the contrary, the same Senate which ratified said treaty passed a resolution on the 14th of February, 1899, introduced by Senator McEnery, of Louisiana, the first paragraph of which is as follows:

> That by the ratification of the treaty of peace with Spain it is not intended to incorporate the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands into citizenship of the United States, nor is it intended to permanently annex said islands as an integral part of the territory of the United States.

This resolution, coupled with the declarations made by Presidents of the United States and other officials of this Government are, and it is so understood by both the American and the Filipino people, expressive of a policy looking toward the severance of the political tie between the Philippines and the United States and the Filipinos and Americans.

It is this policy that inspired the section of the organic act, which the gentleman from Pennsylvania is trying to amend, for it is because of this policy that the Government of the United States has never considered the public lands of the Philippines as a part of the public domain of the United States, to be administered and disposed of for the benefit of the American people, but as the property of the Filipino people, kept in trust by the United States to be administered temporarily by the American Government in the Philippines for the benefit of said Filipino people until such time when the independence of the islands shall have been recognized and granted by this Government.

Let us see what Dr. Schurman, president of Cornell University, has to say on this subject. I read from one of his many instructive speeches on the Philippines:

> Our sovereignty over the Philippines is simply a responsibility for administering a trust on behalf of the people until the people are so organized politically that they may undertake it for themselves. We speak of our territorial acquisition from Spain as "insular possessions," but do we own anything in the Philippines? The title to the public lands rests, indeed, in the United States, but we hold them in trust for the Philippine people and government. The word "possession" is a survival from barbarous times when conquering nations seized the lands of the conquered and levied tribute upon them.

The opinion of Dr. Schurman in this matter is not only weighty because he is internationally known as an authority in political economy, but because he was the first president of the first Philippine Commission, sent by President McKinley to the Philippine Islands as soon as the treaty of peace was concluded between the United States and Spain. President Schurman was, doubtless, informed of the sense in which this Government has assumed sovereignty over the Philippines.

In the light of the foregoing considerations, it would seem that the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania can not be accepted, unless Congress has already decided that the Philippines are forever to be a Territory of the United States and that, therefore, Americans in the islands are entitled to recognition there, as much as they are entitled to recognition in any other State or Territory of the Union. This, of course, would mean the conferring of equal privilege on the Filipinos—that is, that they would be entitled to recognition in any State or Territory of the Union as much as any American citizen. In other words, if an American citizen should be allowed to acquire public land in the Philippines, the Filipinos, correspondingly, ought to be allowed to acquire public land in the United States, which, under the law as it now stands, they can not do unless they become, first, citizens of the United States, through the process that other foreigners have to undergo.

Now, Mr. Speaker, is the House ready to say that the Philippine Islands are to be permanently a Territory of the United States? Is the House ready to declare that the Filipinos are already on an equal footing with the American citizens and that they are, in fact, American citizens? Without first answering these questions affirmatively, the House can not consistently, with modern principles of government and in line with the laws of nature, approve the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Suppose you pass this amendment, and within this or the next session of Congress you enact into law the pending Philippine independence bill, would you then think that it would be right to allow American citizens, without requiring them to acquire Philippine citizenship, to obtain public lands in the Philippine Islands?

Just one word more, Mr. Speaker, and I am through. I hope the House has not understood me as being an anti-American. As I have stated in the beginning of my remarks, I should be very glad to see Americans in the Philippines owning and farming 40 acres of land, because every one who would own and farm that little piece of land would surely make the Philippines his permanent home, and whenever a man makes up his mind to live and die in one country he becomes as good a citizen of that country as any native thereof. I know of a few Americans who have decided to reside permanently in the Philippines, and they are a great help to us. I have just now in mind one of them, Mr. Frank W. Carpenter, the executive secretary. The Filipino people will be glad to enlist in the citizenship of the islands not only Americans but any foreigners who may desire to become Filipino citizens, and as a proof I cite the fact that we have been endeavoring, for many years, to have Congress amend the law regarding citizenship in the Philippines so as to permit anyone, who so desires, to become a citizen of the Philippines. We want good men to form a part of our body politic, and I do not know that there can be found anywhere in the world better men than the citizens of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from the Philippines [Mr. QUEZON] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE BILL SHOULD BE ACTED UPON BY CONGRESS.

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Speaker, I shall avail myself of the courtesy of the House to insert in the RECORD as a part of my remarks a cablegram which the Hon. Sergio Osmeña, speaker of the Philippine Assembly, and also the foremost leader of the Nationalist Party in the Philippines, sent me on March 25, regarding the Jones bill providing for Philippine independence. The cablegram says:

THE FILIPINO PEOPLE FAVOR JONES BILL.

QUEZON, Washington:

In answer to your cablegram wherein you advise me of the terms and conditions of the bill providing Philippine independence, introduced by Congressman JONES, of Virginia, chairman of the Insular Committee of the House, I beg to express my cordial indorsement of same on behalf of the Filipino people as speaker of the assembly and president of the Nationalist Party. The Filipino people en masse have hailed with enthusiasm and gratitude the news of this first step taken in Congress toward the realization of their ideal—the independence of the Philippines—the granting of which has always been considered by said people as a national pledge of the United States to be presently redeemed. The Filipino people are now and always have been convinced of their capability of establishing and maintaining an independent government, amply able to meet all its internal as well as international obligations; and knowing that no foreign government, no matter how altruistic it may be, can ever suit the wants of the islands, nor secure the happiness of the inhabitants thereof, said Filipino people are and always have been urging the recognition of their God-given right to be independent. The Filipino people, as a people, took up arms and fought with the United States against Spain not only for the purpose of throwing off the yoke of Spain, but for the purpose of being free from all foreign control. The Filipinos took the side of the Americans in the Spanish-American War in the firm belief that the prebellum declarations of the United States, its political tenets, and the negotiations between Consul General Pratt and Gen. Aguinaldo meant the sure recognition of Philippine independence as soon as that war shall have been over. Fully alive to its rights, convinced of its capability, and desirous of enjoying its national freedom, the Filipino people have always urged on the American people the granting of its immediate independence.

The Filipino people realize, however, that the contention, made by opponents of Philippine independence that they are incapable of maintaining an independent government, can only be satisfactorily answered by deeds, and, for this reason, the proposal of Congressman JONES that eight years must elapse before the granting and recognition of absolute and complete Philippine independence seems to be a necessary measure to solve that contention definitely. In view of this and as a further proof of their national self-control the Filipino people defer to the postponement for that period of the realization of their cherished ideal.

Please convey to Congressman JONES the sincere gratitude of the Filipino people for his efforts to secure for them the blessings of that national independence which made the United States so happy and so great.

Let me also congratulate you upon your unceasing campaign to present before Congress and the American people the just cause of your country, which is very fortunate in having you as the spokesman of its national aspirations.

OSMEÑA.

This cablegram need not be commented upon. It is an authoritative indorsement of the Philippine independence bill.

But it is not only the speaker who has indorsed said bill. From all over the archipelago cablegrams have been sent praising it, either directly to Mr. JONES himself or to me, by individuals and entities embracing all classes of people. One of the cablegrams addressed to me is signed by Mr. Teodoro Yangco, one of the richest Filipinos, well known by American officials as a very patriotic as well as substantial and conservative citizen. Mr. Yangco's foremost interest is, naturally, to have in the islands a stable government, capable of maintaining public order and protecting the rights and properties of the inhabitants thereof. His indorsement of Mr. JONES's bill is not, therefore, prompted only by his love for the freedom of his country, but also by his conviction that such a government as that which said bill proposes to create will be competent to secure the liberty, happiness, and prosperity of the Filipino people. The cablegram reads:

QUEZON, Washington:

Meeting yesterday all classes Filipinos enthusiastically accepted Jones independence bill. Appointed committee representing all classes society. Beg you transmit Congress and American people our respects and confidence in their altruism and justice by passing Jones bill. Advise Legarda.

YANGCO.

When the business men thus join with the leaders of thought and the masses of the people in urging upon the Congress of the United States the passage of Mr. JONES's bill, there can be left no room for doubt as to the wisdom of said bill, at least, from the standpoint of the natives of the islands. The enthusiasm caused throughout the archipelago by the news of its mere introduction shows that the faith of the Filipino people in the United States has been revived with new vigor by this first step taken in Congress toward the granting of our national freedom.

Mr. Speaker, I do not know that the bill will be reached during the present session, but I sincerely hope that it will be acted upon, at the very latest, at the beginning of the next.

THE ANXIETY OF THE FILIPINOS AS TO THEIR FUTURE SHOULD BE SET AT REST.

I am not going to discuss now the provisions of Mr. JONES's bill, nor am I going to elaborate upon its wisdom and statesmanship. The report, No. 606, accompanying that bill, fully covers these points. The desire of the Filipino people to be independent from foreign yoke has been so invariably expressed in war as in peace that it need not be repeated. The capability of the Filipino people to establish and maintain an independent government has been the subject of such a great amount of literature and is, besides, so convincingly demonstrated in the same above-mentioned report, with arguments based upon facts, that further attempt of discussion here is useless. I shall simply note that Congressman JONES has personally been in the Philippines, making an impartial study of the condition of the people thereof, and, therefore, his report on the subject has a weight that can not be overestimated.

My concern at present is to insist that whatever differences of opinion there may be as to the wisdom of the Jones bill, it will not be fair to the people of the Philippines nor to the people of the United States to let that bill die of nonaction. The present undefined and indefinite relation between the United States and the Philippines is such as no similar precedent can be traced from in the history of this Nation. No colonial possession has ever been acquired by the United States. No colonial possession can ever be acquired by the United States, if it is to remain true to its traditions and to those principles upon which its very existence is founded. Territories have been acquired by this Nation either by purchase, as indemnity of war, or by agreement between the people of the United States and the people of the acquired territory, but in each and all these cases the acquired territory has been acquired with the understanding, from the very beginning, that it shall become permanently an integral part of the United States, to enjoy all the blessings of liberty enjoyed by the rest of the Union. Thus the political status of the heretofore acquired territories has always been settled at the outset. The form of government, from civil or military commission to territorial and statehood, was merely a matter of time, to suit the convenience and prejudices of the American people and their new brethren. The permanent relationship, never to be severed, was a question invariably decided prior to the acquisition.

Such is not the case with regard to the Philippines. The islands have been acquired by the United States as one of the accidents of the Spanish-American War. The Filipinos fought against the Spaniards as American allies not to become American citizens, much less American subjects, but to become citizens of their own independent government. This was known by the consular representatives of the United States in the Far East at the time when they sought and obtained the aid of the Filipinos, as it was also known by the commanders of the American Army and Navy who accepted that aid.

After the Spanish-American War was over, there came the question in the mind of the American people of whether or not the people of the islands were ready to establish and maintain an independent government of their own, but, while there were doubts as to this question, there was a concensus as to the fact that the former allies of this Nation could not be left under Spanish sovereignty without flagrant violation of the most elementary rules of fair dealing. Thus, in the treaty of peace, Spain was forced to relinquish its sovereignty over the Philippines in favor of the United States.

To be sure, however, that the ratification of this treaty by the Senate of the United States did not mean the permanent annexation of the islands, a few days after said ratification took place, the Senate passed the following resolution:

That by the ratification of the treaty of peace with Spain it is not intended to incorporate the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands into the citizenship of the United States, nor is it intended to permanently annex said islands as an integral part of the territory of the United States. But it is the intention of the United States to establish in said islands a government suitable to the wants and conditions of the inhabitants of said islands, to prepare them for local self-government, and in due time to make such disposition of said islands as will best promote the interests of the citizens of the United States and the inhabitants of said islands. (Passed the Senate on the 14th day of February, 1899.)

The first part of this resolution has not been amended in any shape or manner so far, and the second part has not been complied with. No declaration of annexation has been made as yet, nor any other definite or final disposition of the islands. For the United States to continue further without knowing and saying what should be done with the Philippines, in the interest both of the American and Filipino people, is not very complimentary to the wisdom of Congress. Twelve years have gone by since that resolution of noncommitment was passed. If Congress have at heart, as I know it has, the interest of the people of the United States and the people of the Philippines alike, and if the Members of both Houses are equal to their tasks, as I know they are, there is no reason why Congress should not have had ample time and opportunity to find out what "disposition" of the islands "will best promote the interests of the citizens of the United States and the inhabitants of said islands."

The Philippine independence bill and the resolution for the permanent neutralization of the islands, both of which have been reported by the Insular Committee and committed to the Committee of the Whole House, offer an opportunity for Congress to express its will as to the future destiny of the Filipino people. Friends, and enemies as well, of Philippine independence should welcome the early discussion of both the bill and the resolution. They should let the people of this and my country know where they stand, and, in the name of justice, I appeal to all Congressmen and Senators to set at rest the anxiety of my people.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, I sincerely sympathize with what I conceive to be the point of view of the representative of the Philippines. Primarily in his mind is the thought of independence for the Philippines. Anything that in the remotest degree, in his judgment, would retard that much-desired consummation of his hopes is to him wrong.

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt the gentleman for just one question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from the Philippines?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. QUEZON. Does the gentleman think that that is wrong in itself—my position, admitting that that is what he describes it? Does he think that that is wrong?

Mr. TOWNER. What I am saying, Mr. Speaker, is not in reproach of the gentleman from the Philippines. If I were a Filipino, as I am an American, I would probably act and think as he does. [Applause.] But from the standpoint of an American citizen I believe the gentleman's fears are not well founded.

Mr. Speaker, I also sympathize with the idea of other gentlemen on the floor of this House who do not desire that the lands of the Filipinos shall be exploited by corporations for selfish and mercenary purposes, regardless of the interests of the people of those islands. I will go as far as any other one in saying that no single thing should be done that would in any way exploit those islands at the expense of their people. And, Mr. Speaker, our own history with regard to the government of those islands from the time that they came into our possession has been a sufficient answer to that. It has been in no single act a selfish administration. It has not only been generous in the extreme, but from first to last it has been actuated by the highest motives.

But we are met to-day, Mr. Speaker, with a most astounding proposition to an American citizen. We are asked here to-day, as Representatives of the American people, to say that no American citizen shall be allowed to go to the Philippine Government and buy there of the public lands 40 acres for fear that it will result disastrously to those islands and their people. If we take that position, we must imagine that every American citizen who may desire to go to those islands can go there only with the most selfish and mercenary purposes.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT. Does the gentleman state the proposition with entire accuracy? It is already the law that one can not do so.

Mr. TOWNER. With regard to these lands?

Mr. GARRETT. If not, then the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] covers that.

Mr. TOWNER. The amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] is offered for the purpose of applying to this act that is contemplated to be passed, under the provisions of which an American citizen will be prevented from acquiring any part of these lands. Under the administration of the law so far there has been nothing to prevent an American citizen from acquiring a portion of these lands.

Mr. GARRETT. Under the administration of the law, no.

Mr. TOWNER. And the interpretation of it. And if this law is passed without this amendment the effect will be to prevent any American citizen from going to the Philippine Islands and acquiring 40 acres of that land.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to a matter that escaped my notice for the time being, and I think has escaped the notice of the committee. It is the amendment adopted to the bill which provides that unless the Philippine Government shall hereafter provide otherwise by appropriate legislation, either generally or as to any specific tract or tracts, there shall be no such sale. We have given the Philippine Legislature the power to sell this land in any amount, under specific acts. Now, would the gentleman agree with me that by that amendment, and the other amendment if we adopt it, we give to American citizens the right to purchase many more acres than 40 acres, and surround that legislature with a lobby that they will be unable to resist?

Mr. TOWNER. I do not agree with the gentleman with regard to the lobby that they would not be able to resist. My imagination is not sufficient to carry me to that extreme; but I am not sure but the gentleman is right as to the effect of that amendment, if it should become a part of the law.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. It has already been adopted, and has become a part of this bill.

Mr. TOWNER. I am not so sure as to what will be the effect of that law. Certainly the Members of this House, as it seems to me, can not afford to vote down an amendment of this kind. It is a reproach to American citizenship, to the manhood of America, that we will not allow an American citizen to buy a part of American land, held under the American flag, for fear of the ultimate consequences. It seems to me that to go to such an extreme as that is not warranted under any circumstances.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have only this much to say with regard to this whole matter. Here is a little remnant of land consisting of 125,000 acres. This consists of only a few plantations, about 15 in number. It was proposed by the terms of this bill as originally presented that this land should not be disposed of by the Philippine Government, except in 40-acre tracts, to an individual. Now, if we adopt the amendment that has been prepared, it proposes that the Philippine Government may dispose of these lands as they may deem best in their own interest, and to that I entirely agree. Gentlemen here are asking this Congress to pass a law to give the Philippine Government absolute independence, to allow them to dispose of 60,000,000 acres of the public land as they choose, and yet would withhold from them, as this bill originally did, the right to dispose of only 125,000 acres for fear that they would not do it in their own interest; for fear that some lobby may surround them and seduce them from acting with regard to the best interests of their people. If the people of the Philippine Islands are not now capable of protecting their own interests with regard to the disposition of 125,000 acres of land, I am unable to understand how they can be allowed to dispose of 60,000,000 acres of land and undertake the entire government of the Philippine Islands besides.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Is it not the understanding of the gentleman that if this amendment is passed, permitting every citizen of the United States to purchase land, it will not be limited in its application to the remnant of these friar lands, but will be applicable to all of the public domain?

Mr. TOWNER. That is my understanding, but I was speaking generally of the bill as it was originally prepared. I have never regarded this proposition with the seriousness that some gentlemen do. I have not thought that it meant the exploitation of the islands to allow these 15 estates that were left to be disposed of by the Philippine Government as it thought best. Two million dollars remain unpaid of the debt incurred by the Philippine Government for the purchase of these lands, and it was thought that if they could be allowed to dispose of this remnant as they chose in these tracts as they originally existed under the Spanish Government, that they would thus wipe out the unpaid portion of their debt. Certainly no gentleman in his own individual interest, having these lands to dispose of, would think for a moment of disposing of them otherwise, but that proposition is now cured by the amendment that has been accepted and will become a part of the bill, and now we have only left the consideration of this amendment. If this amendment shall not be adopted this Congress will say that we dare not trust an American citizen to purchase 40 acres of land in the Philippine Islands without endangering the interests of the people of those islands. I believe that reflection upon American citizenship is unwarranted and unpatriotic, and therefore I shall vote for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment be concluded in 10 minutes.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I will have to object. I am a member of the committee and I would like to speak on this amendment.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to speak on the bill.

Mr. JONES. I am not undertaking to interfere with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER]. I want to dispose of the amendment, and I would like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MORSE] how much time he desires.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Seven minutes.

Mr. JONES. Then, Mr. Speaker, I will modify my request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana has been recognized and is entitled to an hour.

Mr. JONES. I do not think the gentleman from Indiana wishes to speak on the amendment. I am sure that he wants to dispose of this amendment first and speak afterwards.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I beg to say that unless there is some limit put upon the debate of this amendment, I must speak upon this question if I speak at all. The debate has already taken a very broad range. I perhaps can occupy as wide a range as I desire to in following the gentlemen who have already spoken, but if a reasonable limit can be fixed on this amendment I will be glad to give way.

Mr. JONES. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask that all debate on this amendment be closed in 20 minutes, 7 minutes to be used by the gentleman from Wisconsin and the remainder be controlled by the gentleman from Pennsylvania and myself.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the gentleman's request specify that I may speak five minutes in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. JONES. I will give the gentleman from South Dakota a part of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that debate on this amendment and substitute be limited to 20 minutes, 7 minutes of that time to be used by the gentleman from Wisconsin and 13 minutes to be controlled and equally divided between himself and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, it was my intention, when the amendment was first proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to vote for it, but after examining once more the amendment which was adopted a week ago and which became a part of the bill I feel that it would not be wise to adopt the amendment. That amendment will be found on page 6413 of the RECORD. I will read it. You understand that this is a bill providing for the disposition of the remainder of the friar lands, and it puts them under the same law that applies to the other public lands—no more than 40 acres to be sold to an individual and no more than 2,500 acres to any corporation. But we have adopted this amendment:

Amend, page 2, line 6, by inserting, after the word "islands," the following:

"Unless the Philippine Government shall hereafter provide otherwise by appropriate legislation, either generally or as to any specific tract or tracts."

You see that takes away the 40-acre limit and the 2,500-acre limit and leaves the matter to the Philippine Government, which is composed of a lower and upper house, the upper house being appointed by the President of the United States, and the governor.

Mr. OLMSTED. But that only applies to friar lands.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Well, admitted that the amendment applies only to the friar lands, we are legislating only as to the friar lands. What are we legislating for? For the purpose of preventing the acquisition of large tracts of land by individuals or corporations, either foreign or domestic. There is no other end in view in this legislation—nothing whatever.

The charge has been made and amply proven that under the administration of the law large tracts of land have been going into the hands of certain people. I stated on the floor of the House that the people who purchased them were at the time of the purchase officers of the so-called Sugar Trust. That statement was questioned by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I looked up the record and found I was correct. The hearings do show that the gentlemen admitted that they owned them all, and at the time of the purchase one of them at least was an officer and the others stockholders in the American Sugar Refining Co.—the so-called Sugar Trust.

Now, then, the object of this legislation is to terminate, for the good of the Filipino people, the accumulation of large tracts of land in single ownership, either corporate or individual.

I have here an amendment which I expect to offer, and to offer which the Speaker has promised to recognize me, which, if adopted, will, to my mind, make this bill of some value. If it is not adopted, I can not see any use of passing this legislation, particularly in view of the fact that we have opened up the subject even wider than it was opened before, because there was always in these friar transactions a question of title. There was always a question as to whether or not that land had been legally acquired. It is true they had the opinion of the Attorney General that it had been legally acquired, but as I understand the situation there has been no court decision to that effect and the title is still to that extent clouded.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Yes; for a short question.

Mr. TOWNER. That had reference merely to the interpretation of the law in so far as it affected the limitation on the lands, but there never has been any decision as to whether or not it was a violation of the law—in other words, a fraud—for individuals representing a corporation to procure lands that were for the benefit of the corporation.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. That is probably true, but I do not care anything about the theory. The facts are that individuals did do that. These are the facts, and there is no man in this House who will question them.

Mr. TOWNER. The point I make is that because they did acquire the lands is no indication that they have any title, if they acquired them in fraud, as I believe they did.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. That may be true, but we do not want to continue that kind of title acquiring in the Philippine Islands. Neither does anyone in this House want to continue that policy which we, by this legislation, are trying to change.

If the amendment to which I am addressing myself at this moment be adopted and becomes a part of this law, then you will put it within the power of the Philippine Government to grant not only to the Filipinos but to the American Sugar Refining Co., to Americans, and to anyone, individual or corporation, either there or here, land in any quantity that they may see fit to sell to them. A corporation under that law could go there and with the consent of the Philippine Government be permitted to buy all of the rest of the friar lands, one hundred and twenty-five thousand and odd acres. I say we would defeat the very object of this legislation that we are trying to enact, or, at least, we would put it within the power of the Government of the Philippine Islands to defeat the object of this legislation. Therefore, under those conditions, and in view of the fact that this amendment has been adopted and has become a part of the bill, I believe it is the duty of the Members of this House to defeat that amendment. I believe if we could arrange it so that 40 acres only could be acquired by an American citizen it would be a good amendment, because I think it would be of value to the Philippine people to have a few American citizens go in there and show them how to farm—people, for instance, from our States who are graduates of our agricultural schools. If a few of them could go in there and show them how to farm as we do in this country, it would be a very good thing, and this would be a very valuable amendment; but in view of the fact that the prior amendment has been adopted, I feel certain of the fact that the safety of the islands and the agrarian policy which we are trying there to establish would be conserved by defeating the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MORSE], I think, is not quite correct as to the effect of the amendment adopted the other day, and the effect that this pending amendment would have if adopted. Nobody disputes the proposition that American citizens may now purchase friar lands. This bill, however, proposes to make the friar lands subject to the same qualifications, restrictions, and conditions as now are imposed by law upon the sale of public lands; and it is contended that in the sale of public lands a citizen of the United States may not purchase under the existing law. The object of the pending amendment is simply to give to any American citizen the same right that a native Filipino would have to buy 40 acres of land.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. OLMSTED. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I should not like to let go unchallenged the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that no one now believes that Americans can purchase the friar lands. Those of us who believe that the real intent and spirit of the organic act was that the friar lands should be subject to the same limitations as public lands do not believe now that an American citizen has the right to make a purchase of the friar lands.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I will accept the gentleman's statement, but the bill as it now stands, with the amendment adopted one week ago to-day, provides that nobody can purchase more than 40 acres of any kind of land belonging to the Philippine Government, unless the Philippine Legislature shall by legislation, hereafter to be enacted, permit him to buy more. The upper branch of that legislature consists of nine members, five Americans and four native Filipinos, while the lower branch is composed of Filipinos elected by the native Filipinos, and there could be no legislation enacted without the consent of both bodies.

Surely the gentleman from the Philippines himself and other gentlemen who are willing to vote that they are ready now, or will be very shortly, for self-government do not wish to vote in support of the proposition that they can not themselves be trusted to vote how many acres of land they will sell in any particular tract? To vote that way, in my judgment, is to negative the proposition that they are now or will be for a long time fitted for self-government. Unless that legislature, one branch of which is wholly composed of native Filipinos, selected by Filipinos themselves, shall vote otherwise, no man, under this bill as it now stands, with the amendment adopted last week, can buy more than 40 acres of land, and he has got to live on it five years continuously. Now, the gentleman from the Philippines did not observe the distinction between a resident and a citizen.

A man might go from Washington to the Philippine Islands and remain there five or six years and become a resident of the Philippines, but he would not be a citizen. He is not a statutory citizen under the provisions of the organic act which limits Philippine citizenship to native-born Filipinos and their descendants, and, of course, it is impossible for a man to change his ancestors. Therefore, unless we adopt this amendment which is now pending, it will be impossible for an American citizen to buy even 40 acres of any kind of land in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. QUEZON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLMSTED. With pleasure.

Mr. QUEZON. Would the gentleman from Pennsylvania like to accept this amendment, that those acquiring lands shall become citizens of the Philippine Islands?

Mr. OLMSTED. That would not be germane to the bill before us. It is an entirely different subject. The law already provides that a man purchasing 40 acres must live on it continuously for five years, cultivate, and improve it. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from the Philippines said himself only one week ago, as to the limitation of area, that he was in favor of this amendment, and yet to-day he speaks nearly an hour in opposition to it, and the reason he gives——

Mr. QUEZON. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. OLMSTED. Certainly.

Mr. QUEZON. I do not know I gave that impression here. Personally I said this amendment ought not to be adopted, but if the purpose of the amendment was to be secured and only that purpose that I have no objection to it, but my fear is this will give an opportunity to do certain things which are to be deplored.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, that fear has come upon the gentleman within the past week, for he distinctly said, and it is here in the RECORD, that personally he would have no objection if the area were restricted. Now it is limited to 40 acres unless the Filipinos themselves increase it, but they can do it under this legislation only as to the friar lands. Here is what he said, printed on page 5703 of the RECORD:

Mr. OLMSTED. Would the gentleman be willing to have this bill amended so that citizens of the United States could purchase the public lands?

Mr. QUEZON. Personally I would have no objection to it, provided the citizens of the United States shall be affected by the limitations of the organic act as to area.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized for six and a half minutes.

Mr. JONES. Did the gentleman from South Dakota desire some time?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I do not want to take up the gentleman's time, but I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. JONES. I will yield that time to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. How much time did the gentleman from Virginia yield?

Mr. JONES. Five minutes.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is very peculiarly drawn. It says that every citizen of the United States, not "may" but "shall" be permitted to purchase lands in the Philippine Islands. There is no limitation to the friar lands, which is the subject of the legislation of this bill. It is general in its language, and may apply as well to the public domain of the Philippine Islands as to this remnant of the friar lands. The provision of section 15 of the organic act plainly contemplates that as to the miscellaneous public domain of those islands it shall be disposed of only in small areas to actual inhabitants or citizens of the islands, and very properly, and yet this sort of legislative declaration by Congress would operate, I think, as an amendment to that portion of the organic act and would place a citizen of the United States in a position of demanding the privilege of purchasing under the limitations of this act a certain quantity of this land whether it was the policy of the Government of the Philippine Islands to dispose of it only to citizens of the islands or not. The amendment therefore is very remarkable in its language, and I think would work mischief for that reason if for no other. But my objection to the legislation goes much deeper than the phraseology of the amendment. I think it is fundamental to good government in any country that the agricultural lands upon which the primal industry of agriculture must be performed should be disposed of only to citizens of the country having the public domain. That is a condition of good government, a principle which we have protected in our own affairs from the foundation of the Government, and I have always considered it was one of the best instances of the statesmanship of the people of the United States that this policy ingrafted into the homestead act of 1862 was adopted at a time when the temptation to dispose of our public land to large landholders was very great.

One side of that great legislative controversy in 1862 contended that the Nation's life was in peril and that vast areas of the public domain ought to be disposed of at the greatest possible price as an asset of the war to defend the Union. But wiser and more farseeing statesmanship prevailed, and even under the limitations of the necessities of the case the men of that period adopted the policy that the public lands of the United States should forever be disposed of in small quantities to the actual home builder or empire maker who should go in advance and lay the foundations of the citizenship of this Republic.

We are the trustees of these Filipino people, and we ought not to ingraft upon them by legislation a policy we would not adopt in the management of our own affairs. And it is no criticism of American citizenship to say that we, the trustees of those people, in our legislative might and power will not place upon them provisions that would force them to recognize American citizens, or citizens of any other country than the Philippines, in a right to purchase portions of their agricultural lands. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CULLOP). The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] has one minute and a half remaining.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, there is not one line or one word in the bill before the House relating to who shall or shall not acquire lands in the Philippine Islands. There is not a word in this bill that relates to who may or may not purchase private lands, public lands, or so-called friar lands.

The subject matter of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] is absolutely foreign to everything which is before the House in this bill. He seeks through his amendment not to change anything in this bill; not to change anything in the section of the law to which this bill relates; but to amend in a most important particular the organic law of the Philippine Islands. For that reason, if for none other, the House should vote down this amendment, for it has absolutely nothing to do with the subject matter of the bill. It is, however, an admission, notwithstanding that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] continually says that there are only a few persons who hold that citizens of the United States can not acquire agricultural lands in the Philippine Islands, that the law as it stands prohibits a citizen of the United States from acquiring a single acre of the agricultural public lands in the Philippine Islands. And it is because the gentleman believes in his heart that the interpretation placed upon this law, not only by the minority members of the Insular Affairs Committee in the Sixty-first Congress, but by Judge Madison and two others of the majority members of that committee, is the correct interpretation that he seeks to secure the adoption of this amendment. Now, I do not understand——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will state it.

Mr. OLMSTED. The question is now on the substitute amendment?

The SPEAKER. The Chair was going to state that.

Mr. OLMSTED. If that is voted down there will have to be a vote on the original amendment?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. OLMSTED. Then I will ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] that his substitute be treated as an original amendment so as to save two votes.

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent is asked that the substitute be treated as an original amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. OLMSTED. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House proceeded to divide; and during the division Mr. OLMSTED raised the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. When the names are called, those who are in favor of the substitute will answer "yea," and those opposed will answer "nay." Of course the agreement is that the substitute shall be in place of the original amendment. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

"Provided further, That any citizen of the United States shall be permitted to purchase lands from the Philippine Government subject to the limitations and restrictions of this act as hereby amended."

Mr. GARNER. Is that a substitute?

Mr. OLMSTED. Yes; that is what we are about to vote on now.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 66, nays 156, answered "present" 13, not voting 157, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. CRUMPACKER rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak in opposition to the bill now before the House for consideration. I was unable to be present on last Calendar Wednesday or on the Calendar Wednesday before, and I did not hear the arguments made for and against the measure on those days; but I have read every speech upon the question that has been published in the RECORD. I feel justified in saying a few words in this connection in relation to the amendment that was just voted down by the House, an amendment proposing to give American citizens the right to make homestead entries in the Philippine Islands under the organic law and in accordance with the conditions and limitations therein contained. Some seem to believe that a citizen of the United States residing in the islands is not allowed to locate upon and become the owner of a homestead of 40 acres of the public lands, simply because the law does not, by express terms, make him a citizen of the Philippine Government. My individual judgment is that citizens of the United States residing in the Philippine Islands are citizens of the Philippine Government within the meaning of the homestead law. This Government holds sovereign power over the Philippine Archipelago, and the title to the public lands in the archipelago is in the United States. Those islands were rescued from Spanish oppression by American valor, by the shedding of American blood. The Constitution of the United States declares that every person born within the United States or naturalized therein is a citizen of the United States and a citizen of the State where he resides. Territory within the jurisdiction of this Government is a State within the citizenship provision of the Constitution, and a citizen of the United States is a citizen of the islands under the flag while he resides in the islands. It is to me an absurd proposition to say that even the soldiers who fought under the flag in conquering Spanish authority in the archipelago do not possess the poor privilege of becoming residents of the islands and of taking up homesteads of 40 acres of land, on condition that they shall improve, cultivate, and live on the lands for five years, and upon the further condition that they shall not sell or encumber their holdings during that period. I voted for the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] to remove all possible doubt about the question in the minds of some Members and not because I thought there was any doubt about it myself.

Mr. Speaker, this whole friar-land question, it seems to me, has been enshrouded with a great deal of confusion and misunderstanding. It has been badly obfuscated. There is an attempt here to make a mountain out of a molehill. The bill presents a simple business question respecting the change of the law for the disposition of the remaining friar lands. In the course of the discussion some gentlemen who have spoken have taken occasion to cast reflections upon the administration of the Philippine Government, and particularly the administration of the public lands. We heard those same criticisms a year or two ago, and the last Congress authorized an investigation of the administration of public lands in the islands. That investigation was made by the Committee on Insular Affairs. It was exhaustive, it was thorough, it was impartial; and the result was that the administrative officers in the Philippines were absolutely vindicated. I will quote a paragraph of the report of the committee conducting that investigation from the summary:

> We find that the administration of lands in the Philippine Islands has been fairly and honestly conducted, and that the charges and insinuations to the contrary which have been made against the officials charged with the execution of the laws in relation thereto, whether officers of the Philippine Government or of the United States, are unwarranted and unjust.

That report was made by eight members of the majority and one of the minority of the committee, and the findings were concurred in by four other members in separate statements. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER], of the minority, made a supplemental statement in which he said:

> I fully concur in the foregoing report as far as it goes, but I desire to make the following additional suggestion.

Three other members of the committee, Messrs. HUBBARD of Iowa, DAVIS of Minnesota, and MADISON of Kansas, submitted supplemental views, in which they said:

> The committee has fully discharged its duty to make a complete and thorough investigation of the interior department of the Philippine Islands with regard to the administration of Philippine lands, and we concur in the findings of the foregoing, that there have been no sales of Philippine lands in violation of law, and that the officials having in charge the execution of the land laws of the Philippines have been honest and conscientious. They are not in our judgment subject to censure. Their task has not been an easy one. They have had many burdens laid upon them, not the least of which has been the interpretation of the provisions of the act of 1902, providing a civil government for the Philippines with regard to the lands they were administering.

Five out of nineteen members of the committee dissented.

I submit that no fair-minded man can go through the history of that investigation and read the testimony taken without reaching the conclusion that the handling of public lands in the islands constitutes as clean a page as can be found in all the annals of American administration.

It is an easy thing to criticize, an easy thing to find fault with conditions that exist 10,000 miles away, but it is difficult sometimes to disprove charges and insinuations against faithful public officers. My belief is that Congress ought to defer largely to the judgment and the fidelity of the men who have been selected to administer affairs in the Philippine Archipelago, men who are on the ground, men who know infinitely more than we can know respecting social, economic, and political conditions there and of the needs and wants of the inhabitants.

It seems to me we make a grave mistake when we undertake to legislate respecting details from American standards against the judgment and over the protest of those who are on the ground and charged with the responsibility of administration. How many Members of this House have personal knowledge of the conditions that prevail in the Philippines?

I undertake to say, Mr. Speaker, that the organic act has been interpreted and applied by the Philippine Government exactly as it was enacted by Congress, exactly as Congress intended it should be interpreted and applied. It was made by a Congress that was thoroughly familiar with conditions existing at that time and the reasons for the purchase of the friar lands and the manner of their disposition.

When this Government secured control of the archipelago under the Paris treaty there came to the United States something over 60,000,000 acres of public lands. Under that treaty the title to those lands was vested in the Government of the United States. When we came to make the organic law for the civil government of the islands, we made careful provision for the disposition of the public lands for the benefit of the people of the islands. In the course of my remarks when I refer to the "public lands" I mean those lands the title to which was vested in the United States by the Paris treaty, and when I refer to the lands purchased of the religious orders I shall designate them as "friar lands."

Congress outlined its land policy for the islands in the provisions in the organic law for the disposition of the public lands. It established the homestead policy and surrounded it with safeguards to prevent exploitation more effectually than was ever done for the protection of the public lands in this country. Limitations were fixed so there could be no "dummy" entries, as has been the case under the land laws at home. If any criticism can be justly made against the Philippine land laws it is that they are so rigid as to retard development. No opportunities were left open to speculators and exploiters.

But the mistake has been made by Members of the House in the discussion of this question in failing to discriminate between the public lands and the friar lands. Because some unoccupied friar lands have been sold in large tracts Members have spoken, protesting vigorously and vehemently against the exploitation of the public lands of the islands.

The distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] awhile ago quoted a statement from the report of Mr. Taft when he was Secretary of War, declaring that he was not in favor of using or permitting the use of the public lands in the Philippine Islands for sugar raising.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will yield for a question.

Mr. TOWNER. Was it not said in the quotation from Mr. Taft that he placed his disapproval upon the exclusive use of the public lands for sugar raising?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is the point I was coming to; he said he was not in favor of the exclusive use of all the lands for sugar raising, and he gave sound reasons for his objections. Is there anybody in this House or in this country advocating the exclusive use of the public lands of the islands for sugar plantations? Why, the entire area of the friar lands was only 400,000 acres as against over 60,000,000 acres of the public lands that can not be exploited; that can not be sold excepting under rigid limitations and conditions. Mr. Taft in that report, and in a number of other reports, recommended the establishment of a number of modern sugar mills in the islands. He said it would promote development; that it would be an object lesson to the natives; that it would stimulate enterprise and activity along right lines. Much of the friar lands was in small tracts, in possession of tenants. They were largely occupied, and the law requires that the tenants shall have the first right to purchase their holdings. The unoccupied and unimproved lands are those over which the controvery arises. Suppose the Government should sell all of the unoccupied friar lands in large tracts for the purpose of sugar production, would it amount to an exploitation of the public lands—200,000 acres out of 60,000,000 acres? Every objection that has been made to the sale of the unoccupied friar lands in large tracts is more than answered in the fact that there can be no oppression, no condition approaching serfdom, because if the natives do not care to work in the sugar mills there are 60,000,000 acres of public lands open to homesteads on easy terms and at a nominal cost.

It is the experience of sugar producers in the Tropics that one who goes to the expense of constructing a modern sugar mill must have several thousand acres upon which to produce cane, because reliance upon small farms for a cane supply is too precarious. The average sugar plantation in control of mill owners in Cuba is above 15,000 acres. Public lands in the Philippines can not be sold in larger tracts than 40 acres to an individual or 2,500 acres to a corporation. The public lands can be bought for $2 an acre, but no one would undertake to build a sugar mill on 40 acres of land, or on even 2,500 acres. The San Jose tract, which was sold to the Havemeyer syndicate, was surrounded with public lands equally as fertile, and which were for sale at $2 an acre. The San Jose tract sold for over $6 an acre, because it contained a number of thousand acres. If it could only have been sold in 40-acre tracts, it would have taken 50 years to dispose of it, and then it could not have sold for more than the public lands were offered for.

Discrimination must be made between the sale of public lands for homesteads, in 40-acre tracts, at $2 an acre, and the sale of large areas of unoccupied friar lands for sugar mills, at from $6 to $25 an acre. Discrimination must be made between the policy of selling the public lands at a small price for the encouragement of agriculture and the policy of selling the friar lands for the purpose of creating a fund with which to pay the bonds given for their purchase.

There has been much said about absentee landlordism, and it has been declared that it was the object of the Government in taking over the lands of the religious orders to break up the large tracts into small holdings. There was no such purpose in the mind of Congress in providing for the purchase of those lands. No one had any such idea. There was a condition, which has been referred to in the course of this debate, involving a bitter enmity on the part of the tenants of the friar lands against the friars themselves. It was not a matter of absentee landlordism, because the landlords were on the ground and the cause of the trouble. It was not a question of buying up large tracts of land with a view of cutting them up into small holdings, because there was no objection whatever to the quantity of land held by the religious orders, as there was an abundance of public land that natives could locate upon and use without interference. There were two large tracts, aggregating about 110,000 acres—the San Jose estate, which was purchased by Poole for the New York syndicate, and the Isabela estate—which were wholly unoccupied and unimproved, that it was not the intention of the Government to buy at all, because they were in no way the subject of friction or trouble. They were the largest tracts held by the friars, but they had no tenants.

I am authorized by President Taft to say that after the passage of the organic law he made a voyage to Rome with the view of negotiating for the purchase of the friar lands, and his first proposition was to exclude the San Jose and the Isabela estates from consideration altogether, as there was no need of buying those lands, because they were untenanted and the source of no trouble whatever.

If that proposition had been accepted, the title to the San Jose estate in Mindoro and the title to the Isabela estate in northern Luzon would have remained in the religious orders, and they could have sold both estates, even to the Havemeyers, without let or hindrance. But the representative of the friars very naturally refused to consider any proposition that did not include those large estates, so the Philippine Government was compelled to buy them in order to secure the lands that were held by tenants and about which the trouble existed.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. For a question in that connection.

Mr. JONES. Then why was it that he did not buy the large estate on the Pasig River of 8,000 acres, which belonged to the friars, and that was very densely populated?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. There seemed to have been no trouble about that tract, and there has been no trouble there since.

Mr. JONES. Oh, there was trouble there.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I am not ready to accept the gentleman's statement on that question. There has been no trouble over that estate. The small—or, as the gentleman calls it, the large—estate of 8,000 acres was kept by the friars for their own use. The basis of all difficulty between the friars and the tenants was agrarian and political. The friars were the parish priests in the islands, very largely, and they had absolute political authority in all municipalities in their several parishes. Mr. Taft described them in his statement before the committee as "Spanish policemen." The tenants were all devout Catholics. The friars collected rents from the tenants and used them for carrying on certain functions that pertained to the religious orders as such. In addition they imposed substantial exactions upon the tenants for the purpose of raising further funds to carry on the work of the church; and the tenants took the view that while the title to the lands was in the religious orders, they held the land in trust for the church, and that the rents of the lands should go to the maintenance of the church instead of to educational and other uses outside. They came to look upon those priests as the personification of all that was arbitrary and despotic in Spanish administration. I will quote briefly from Mr. Taft's statement. He said:

There is another question connected with the friars that is far wider in importance because it affects the whole archipelago. That is the question of the friars' return to their parishes. The people are Catholics, and they are fond of their church, and the church is a great part of their life. They have their fiestas, and the church takes part in almost every function in the family, and they have no disposition to leave the church. That they should have such a deep feeling of hostility against those persons who would administer the sacraments of the church—and they love the church itself—indicates that there was a very deep reason for their hostility. It would be found in the political power that the friars exercised in the last 50 years. They were the policemen of Spain. They exercised absolute power in every municipality within their respective parishes, and they were made responsible by the people for every act of oppression, individual or general, which might be charged to the Spanish Government.

That statement explains clearly the source of the trouble and the necessity of the Government securing control of the occupied lands to avoid conflict.

In 1896 there was an uprising among the tenants, and the priests were driven from their parishes. Upward of 50 of them were killed and 300 and over were put into prison. When the United States secured control of the islands, after peace had been established, following the Paris treaty, our Government was bound to protect the religious orders in the enjoyment of their property. The Philippine Commission knew that if proceedings were instituted to compel the tenants to pay rent to the friars for the lands it meant conflict; it meant insurrection and bloodshed. There is no way of estimating the sacrifice of human life and treasure that might have resulted in suppressing such an outbreak. Furthermore, it was of vital importance to assure the natives of our friendship and unselfish purposes in administering their affairs.

So it was decided that it would be cheaper and better from every standpoint to buy the lands and solve the difficult and ugly problem in that way, and Congress authorized the Philippine Government to make the purchase and issue bonds to raise the purchase money. Some have contended that the limitations contained in section 15 of the organic act were intended to apply to the friar lands, but I believe that no lawyer can carefully read that act and study the conditions under which it was made without reaching the conclusion that those conditions and limitations were never intended to apply to the sale of the friar lands. Those conditions and limitations were peculiarly adapted to a homestead policy. It might as well be said that if the Government of the United States should buy, say, 6,000 acres of land in this country for a rifle range and it should afterwards conclude to abandon the rifle range that the homestead laws would at once attach to the land. Those limitations were never intended to apply to the friar lands, because they are not adapted to public lands which have been acquired by purchase with the intention of selling them for enough to pay the purchase money. I expect to demonstrate before I finish my remarks that the friar lands were not intended by Congress to be sold under the homestead laws. I assert that there has been no public officer who has given an opinion upon the question who has not decided unequivocably that the limitations in section 15 and other homestead sections of the law do not apply to the friar lands. The law officer in the bureau of public lands in the Philippine Islands gave that opinion first.

The attorney general of the Philippine Islands, a native and an able lawyer, gave the same opinion, and later on, in connection with the San Jose estate, the Attorney General of the United States gave the same opinion. In the investigation made by the Committee on Insular Affairs in the last Congress all but 5 members of the committee out of 19, after a thorough and exhaustive investigation of the facts and the law, declared unequivocally that the conditions and limitations contained in section 15 did not and were not intended to apply to the friar lands. The organic act passed the Senate first. The Senate placed no limitation upon the quantity of friar lands that might be sold to a single individual, excepting that tenants should have the first right to buy their own holdings. The Senate bill authorized the Philippine Commission to make rules and regulations for the lease and other disposition of the public lands and required the commission to report those rules and regulations to the President for his approval, and if the President approved them that they should be submitted to Congress, and if Congress failed to amend or disapprove them at the following session they became law, but the Senate bill declared that a single homestead of public lands should not contain more than 40 acres, or its equivalent, in hectares. That was the only limitation in the bill. In another chapter, disconnected altogether from the public-land provisions, the bill took up the question of the friar lands and authorized their purchase and sale. It provided that those lands should be sold or disposed of in such manner as the Philippine Government might determine. They were not required to make rules and regulations for the disposition of the friar lands and send them back here for approval. The bill provided, however, that those lands should not be sold for less than the purchase price, an important thing to bear in mind. Furthermore, it provided that the proceeds of the lands should constitute a sinking fund for the purpose of paying the principal and the interest of the bonds issued for their purchase and that the interest on deferred payments for lands should be the same as the interest on the bonds. It was a simple business proposition for the Government to buy the lands to get rid of a troublesome question with the express intention of selling them first to the tenants, then the unoccupied portions to others for money enough to discharge the debt incurred in their purchase. The lands cost the Government $7,000,000. That looks like a small sum to the United States. Did you ever stop to reckon, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, how much that would be equivalent to here, considering our business and financial operations and the population and the per capita wealth of the two countries? Seven million dollars against the Philippine Government would amount to more than $700,000,000 against the United States. There are $2,000,000 of the bonds yet to be paid. It is a trifle; it is but a mere bagatelle from our standpoint; but we are not paying the money out of our own Treasury.

It is to be paid by the sweat and toil of the people of the Philippine Islands, and $2,000,000 is more for them to pay than $200,000,000 would be for the Government of the United States to pay. Congress concluded that the lands ought to pay the cost of their purchase.

It has been said that no one had in mind the sale of the lands for enough to pay the bonds. Mr. Taft, in explaining the situation to the Committee on Insular Affairs in 1902, said:

What I mean is, if we buy the lands we put the title of the Government between the friars and the subsequent disposition of the lands, and that then the Government may, by liberal terms to the tenants, enable the tenants, by payments strung over a long number of years, to become the owners of the land. The payments can be arranged so that not much more than the rent would nevertheless pay for the land. And in that way I think the insular government could probably be made whole or nearly so. I think the plan proposed by the commission as adopted in the bill introduced by Mr. COOPER contemplates the establishment of a sinking fund out of the proceeds of the sales of the lands to the tenants to meet the bonds.

Those who say that we were not to treat this matter, in a measure, as a business proposition, and were to pay no regard to the sale of the lands with a view of discharging the bonds, know little about the considerations that prompted Congress to authorize the purchase and sale of the lands.

Mr. Taft, in discussing the unoccupied San Jose and Isabella estates, was asked by Mr. WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, now Senator, then a member of the Committee on Insular Affairs, if there was any necessity for the purchase of those two tracts. Mr. Taft said:

No; the same necessity would not exist for the purchase of the Mindoro tract and the Cagayan tract. The Mindoro tract is a tract used for cattle only, and in a part of the islands where there are practically no tenants, and where there is no feeling one way or the other, and so probably it would be the same with the Cagayan Valley.

It was expected that the lands would be sold for money enough to relieve the people of the islands of the burden of debt that they had incurred in their purchase, and everybody knows that they could not be sold for any such price under the conditions and limitations contained in section 15 that were in their very nature adapted to a homestead policy.

The Senate put no limitation on the quantity of the friar lands that could be sold to any one individual, excepting that which goes along with a provision that the occupants should have the first right to buy their holdings. When the bill came up in the House the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES], who was then a member of the Committee on Insular Affairs—as a matter of fact, he is one of the charter members of that committee—realizing that there was no limitation on the friar lands, offered an amendment which appears on page 7443 of volume 35 of the RECORD, part 8, limiting the amount of friar lands that could be sold to one person. The House bill fixed 16 hectares, or 40 acres, as the size of a homestead of public lands.

The gentleman did not provide in his amendment that the same limitation should apply to the friar lands, but he proposed a limit of 40 hectares, or 100 acres, for those lands. He spoke in support of his amendment against the danger of monopolizing the lands unless there was some limit placed upon the amount that could be sold to one individual. Other speeches were made for and against the amendment. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], who was then chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs, took part in the debate. He opposed the amendment and said there was a distinction between the friar lands and the public lands, and that limitations adapted to the public lands might not be applicable to the friar lands.

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman permit a question just there?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. A question; yes.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman has referred to the fact that I offered an amendment. The gentleman knows, of course, that section 16, to which I offered the amendment, did not contain the words "subject to the limitations and conditions of this act," which are now in the organic act. That is true, is it not?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I understand that. If the gentleman will give me the time I will explain that proposition, and I think I can make it clear.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman has quoted from me. If he will read a little further down he will find I used these identical words——

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I hope the gentleman will not quote from the RECORD, as my time is short.

Mr. JONES. I will yield the gentleman the time.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. If the gentleman will secure me an extension of time I will yield.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] decline to yield?

Mr. JONES. The gentleman has agreed to yield.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. On condition.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman will find if he will read my remarks on that amendment I used these words:

> The result will be that the lands will become a part of the public lands of the islands and will be disposed of as this bill proposes those public lands will be disposed of.

That is what I always contended.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The public lands could not be sold in larger tracts than 40 acres, and the gentleman proposed to sell the friar lands in 100-acre tracts. The Capitol Grounds are public lands of the United States; but does that mean that they are homestead lands or that they are salable? All lands the title of which is vested in the Government are public lands.

Mr. Lacey, of Iowa, who was then chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands in the House, and who, I think, was more familiar with the land laws than any other man in either branch of Congress, spoke against the Jones amendment, insisting that the question of the amount of friar lands that could be sold to one individual should be left with the Philippine Commission, who were on the ground and knew better than Congress could know what was best to do in that respect. The Jones amendment was beaten by a vote of 63 to 33.

The House knew there was no limitation in the bill upon the amount of friar lands that could be sold to one person, and after full discussion, by a vote of almost two to one, decided that there should be no such limitation, but that that question should be left to the discretion of the Philippine Government.

After the bill passed the House it went to conference, and concessions were made and the act of July 1, 1902, was the result. The Senate consented to the striking out of the provision that the friar lands should not be sold for less than the cost price. The House took the position that while it was expected that the lands would sell for enough to cover the bonds, yet it might be necessary in some instances to pay more than the lands were worth, and if that hard-and-fast provision were left in the bill it might defeat the sale of some tracts altogether, so it was decided to leave that question also to the discretion of the Philippine Government.

"The conditions and limitations" in the friar land sections of the act referred to such conditions and limitations only as were applicable to lands that were bought and held with the expectation that they would be sold for enough to pay the purchase price. "The conditions and limitations" meant those that were applicable. It was not the intention of Congress to import conditions and limitations into the friar land sections that were only applicable to a homestead policy. Everyone at all familiar with the situation knows that the friar lands could not have been sold for the purchase price under the public-land provisions at all.

All those problems have been fully investigated, and every public officer, every law officer, who carried the responsibilities of his oath of office, has upheld the Philippine Government in its disposition of the friar lands. I remember that when we entered upon the investigation in the last Congress the late Judge Madison announced, in the presence of the committee, that he was strongly inclined to believe that the friar lands should be disposed of under the conditions and limitations provided for the disposition of the public lands.

His mind was open to conviction, however, and before the close of the investigation he became convinced that his original impression was wrong. He declared unequivocally that there was not a court of respectable standing in America that would not hold that the conditions and limitations that are peculiarly adapted to the homestead policy were not applicable to the disposition of friar lands, and it was never the intention of Congress that they should be so applied.

The question is reduced to one of policy. Seventy per cent in point of value and 60 per cent in quantity of the friar lands have already been sold. Every foot of land sold has brought the cost price, plus the accumulated interest, together with the cost of administration. The sales have aggregated about $5,000,000. The tenants, who were the principal purchasers, bought in good faith under the law and paid for their lands, and it is now proposed to provide that the balance, the remaining 30 per cent of the lands, shall be practically given away. Is that fair and just to the taxpayers of the islands? Is it fair and just to the thousands of tenants who have bought and paid the full value for their lands? There may be 125,000 acres of unoccupied land yet unsold. The occupied lands are in small areas, as a rule, some of them a half acre, some an acre, some even 125 or 130 acres. They are substantially all disposed of. Each tenant took his holding and paid the price for it that the Government had to pay, with interest and the cost of surveying and administration.

If the Congress will permit the Philippine Government to continue under the policy so clearly and definitely embodied in the organic law, it will be only a comparatively short time until the balance of the friar lands will be disposed of and complete provision made for the payment of all the bonds, and that episode in the history of the Government will be a closed incident.

I refer again to the talk about absentee landlordism. If the friars had been absent from the islands there would have been no difficulty; there would have been no friction. There is no purpose or intention to exploit the public lands, but it is the intention to dispose of them in accordance with the organic act. If we close the door in the Philippines against American money and American enterprise, how can we hope that there will be any development in that fertile country? The eloquent gentleman from the islands [Mr. QUEZON] seems to be living in continual fear of Americanizing the islands. He opposes every proposition that looks toward American enterprise and the investment of American capital and the extension of American influence there. He has in mind immediate independence of the people of the Philippines.

Let me ask how in the name of common sense can those people be fitted for independence until the agencies of thrift and enterprise are at work, until there is substantial industrial freedom, and economic independence among the people. Our administration has done a great work in the archipelago. The Government there is in the hands of capable, honest, clean men. They know more about the situation there and the wants and needs of the people than we do. Let us stand by them unless we are morally sure they are making a serious mistake. They are simply doing what Congress said they should do when it passed the organic act in 1902, and they are making a magnificent success of it.

I should like to have the time to make some reference to Havemeyer and those associated with him in the purchase of the San Jose land. There has been no sale of land in the islands in violation of law either in letter or spirit. Havemeyer has not been outlawed. He is a young man 23 or 24 years of age. His misfortune perhaps was in the selection of a progenitor. The name Havemeyer is a bugaboo. If you want to stampede a bunch of politicians who are looking for reelection bring out the old scarecrow labeled "Rockefeller" or "Havemeyer" and the explosion will be instantaneous. I have no doubt that young Havemeyer could buy land in any State in the Union.

The charge that the American Sugar Refining Co., commonly known as the Sugar Trust, is interested in the purchase of the San Jose estate in the Philippines is absolutely unfounded. That estate contains about 56,000 acres in the wilds of the island of Mindoro. It was unoccupied and unimproved. The Philippine Government had to buy that land in order to get the lands that were occupied by tenants under the friars and which were the source of trouble. The truth is that the interests of the Sugar Trust are against the development of sugar production in the Philippines. The beet-sugar industries in this country, and particularly those in Colorado, Utah, and Idaho, have bitterly opposed every proposition to admit sugar into this country from the Philippine Islands free of duty. They sent an agent to the islands several years ago to investigate conditions there with a view of determining the resources of those islands that might be adapted to sugar production. That agent reported that while the islands were fertile and could be made to produce large quantities of sugar that under the crude and archaic methods used there was no probability of any considerable quantity of sugar being produced there for many years to come.

When the Payne tariff bill was up for consideration, the beet-sugar interests agreed to withdraw their opposition to the bill, if the quantity of sugar to be imported from the Philippines should be limited to 300,000 tons a year. The bill went through, with that provision, without opposition from the beet-sugar men. When that bill became a law, a New York syndicate, headed by Horace Havemeyer, purchased the San Jose land, with the view of establishing a sugar plantation and a modern sugar mill thereon. Then the beet-sugar interest started sensational stories throughout the country and in the Philippines, to the effect that the Sugar Trust was intending to exploit the public lands in the islands and warned the people here and in the islands against the approaching danger.

That movement was started by the beet-sugar people, principally for the purpose of preventing the development of sugar production in the Philippines by modern methods, and thereby keeping out of our markets any considerable quantity of sugar that might come in free of duty. It was a scheme on their part to frighten the people and to cause Congress to amend the law so as to prohibit the production of sugar in the islands by successful methods. The Sugar Trust had no interest whatever in the San Jose property, either present or prospective. Horace Havemeyer, who was a member of the syndicate, was a director of the Sugar Trust at the time they made the purchase, and the board of directors protested against his investment in the Philippines and compelled him to resign as a director of the trust, which he did, and he gave up all the stock he owned in that institution.

The Sugar Trust owns a large if not a controlling share of the stock in the beet-sugar factories in the States of Colorado, Utah, and Idaho and it was to the interest of those concerns to keep Philippine sugar out of this country, so instead of the Sugar Trust attempting to exploit the Philippine Islands for its own selfish uses, it has permitted the use of its name as a scarecrow to stifle the development of sugar production in the islands.

The agent of the beet-sugar interests who investigated conditions in the archipelago, was present and attended all of the hearings during the investigation of the public-land question by the last Congress. Those interests sent out sensational stories to the people of the Philippines to the effect that the big monopolies of the United States were getting ready to absorb all of the public lands in the island and to reduce the people to a condition of peonage and serfdom, and if they succeeded it would forever prevent the political independence of the islands. Politicians and fomenters of enmity against the American administration in the Philippines, used those sensational but groundless statements for the purpose of exciting feeling in the minds of the natives against the United States. The fact is the Philippine Archipelago is being exploited by politicians here and there to advance their own selfish ambitions. They are willing to excite feelings of bitterness and hostility in the minds of the simple Filipinos against this country, if they can advance their own political interests by so doing.

This whole problem may be summed up in a few words. The natives in the islands were involved in a very bitter controversy with certain religious orders known as the friars. This Government concluded that it was best to buy the lands owned by the friars and sell them to the tenants, so as to avoid conflict and bloodshed. The organic law conferred authority upon the Philippine Government to purchase the lands. That Government bought the lands for $7,000,000 and issued bonds to pay for them. The law required that tenants be given the preference in the purchase of their own holdings. About one half the lands were occupied by tenants and the other half was unoccupied. Seventy per cent in value and 60 per cent in area of the friar lands have been sold. Every foot that has been sold so far has brought the full cost price to the Government plus the accrued interest and the cost of administration. Five million dollars of the $7,000,000 of bonds issued for the purchase of the lands have been provided, leaving $2,000,000 yet to be paid by the people of the islands. There are about 125,000 acres of the land yet unsold. If the Government of the Philippines shall be let alone, within a comparatively short time it will have disposed of every acre of the friar land at cost, and that debt will be entirely wiped out of existence and the people of the islands will be relieved of the burden of bearing it.

It was the intention of Congress that those lands should be sold for money enough to pay the bonds that were issued for the purchase of the lands. The unoccupied lands can not be sold for the cost price, excepting by selling them in tracts to suit purchasers. This was the intention in making the law, and it has been the policy of the Philippine Government in relation to those lands ever since. Every officer who is charged with the responsibility of administration in the archipelago opposes any change in the organic law respecting the friar lands.

Everyone familiar with conditions in the Philippines is of the opinion that it would be good policy to encourage the establishment of several modern sugar mills and plantations in the islands on the theory that it would aid in the industrial development of the archipelago and that it would instill a spirit of industrial enterprise in the inhabitants. Of the unoccupied friar lands, 200,000 acres could be devoted to sugar production on a modern scale to great advantage to the people. There are 60,000,000 acres of public lands in the archipelago, most of which are open to homestead entries on easy terms. Two hundred thousand acres devoted to the production of sugar would be less than one-third of 1 per cent of the public lands. There could be no exploitation of the lands and no oppression of the natives of the islands under a policy of that kind.

President Taft, while he was governor of the islands and while he was Secretary of War, repeatedly declared that he was opposed to applying all the lands in the archipelago to sugar production, but he always insisted that it would be good policy to have a number of modern sugar mills and plantations in the islands. Two hundred thousand acres of land devoted to sugar out of sixty million acres devoted to other products is a very modest proportion. The tendency would be to promote industrial development and increase the opportunity for labor and incidentally to increase wages. Wages have already more than doubled since the Americans have occupied the islands. The only part of the friar lands that is to be devoted to sugar production is the San Jose tract. A sugar mill on that land has already been constructed and is ready for operation. There is no doubt that it will be a great benefit to the people of the islands. The sale of the balance of the friar lands, in accordance with the organic law and the policy of the government thereunder, will relieve the people of the payment of the bonds yet unprovided for.

Every consideration of wisdom and prudence protests against a change of the law under which such satisfactory progress has been made.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add, on page 2, in line 21, after the word "holdings," the following: "Provided, however, That no individual shall be permitted to acquire more than 2,500 acres of these lands."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that this amendment is not germane.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. I desire to be heard briefly on the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the amendment says:

Provided, however, That no individual shall be permitted to acquire more than 2,500 acres of these lands.

The bill provides for the disposition of certain lands, the lands purchased by the friars, and this applies to these lands which are described in the same paragraph.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I am not entirely sure that I understand just what is sought to be accomplished by this amendment. It would seem from the wording of the amendment that the proposition of the gentleman is that no individual shall be permitted to acquire more than 2,500 acres of the undisposed of friar lands. But I understand the purpose of the gentleman to be, although I doubt if his amendment would accomplish that purpose, that no individual shall acquire more than 2,500 acres of these lands from anybody; that no individual shall acquire more than 2,500 acres of the friar lands that may have already been sold by the Government to individuals. To illustrate, some 70 per cent of the 388,000 acres have already been sold, and the purpose of this amendment is to prevent any individual from acquiring more than 2,500 acres of those lands. Is not this the purpose of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Yes; of the friar lands.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman admits this to be the purpose of his amendment. If the amendment provided that nobody could acquire more than 2,500 acres of friar lands from the Government, then it would be germane, but if its meaning is that nobody shall be permitted to acquire more than 2,500 acres of friar lands now owned by individuals, then it clearly is not germane. Some eight thousand and odd parcels of the friar lands have been sold to Filipinos, and those Filipinos under the law, after occupying them five years, can sell them to anybody. This amendment is intended to deprive these Filipinos of this right.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from Virginia that the effect of the amendment is one thing and whether it is germane is another.

Mr. JONES. I am stating the effect in order to show that the amendment is not germane. As I said in the beginning, I was somewhat in doubt when the amendment was offered whether it was intended to apply only to the undisposed of friar lands, but the gentleman offering it frankly avows that his purpose in doing so is to prevent any individual from holding in excess of 2,500 acres of friar lands, no matter from whom acquired.

If it would accomplish this purpose it is, in my opinion, not germane to the subject matter of the bill.

The amendment is not intended to apply only to the 125,000 acres which the Government owns. It would be competent for Congress to say that these lands should not be disposed of in excess of 2,500 acres to any one individual, but, in my opinion, it is not competent for Congress, even if the amendment were germane, to say that land held in private ownership shall not be sold in excess of 2,500 acres. This would be in contravention of the treaty of Paris, I think.

But, as I have said, the amendment is not germane, because this bill, which it proposes to amend, simply seeks to limit the sale of the undisposed-of friar lands. This amendment is a very sweeping one. It not only provides that the Government shall not sell in excess of 2,500 acres to any individual, but that no individual can acquire from any other individual any part of the two hundred and sixty thousand and odd acres now held in private ownership, and therefore it is not germane.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman this question: Does he or not think that if the Legislature of Missouri or Virginia or any other State came to the conclusion that it was dangerous for a citizen to own more than 160 acres of land in that State, it would be competent for the legislature to limit the amount that any individual could hold?

Mr. JONES. Such a law would not be constitutional in any of the States that have constitutions with which I am at all familiar. There may be States where such legislative action would be constitutional, but it has never been attempted in any State in the Union, so far as I know. Of course, it is competent to limit what a corporation may hold, because a corporation is a creature of the State. The State can say that a corporation engaged in the banking business shall only hold enough land upon which to build a banking house; or that one engaged in agriculture shall only own so many acres. But that is not the question here. I think, Mr. Speaker, that even if the Chair were to hold the amendment germane, and it should be adopted, it could not be carried into effect. I do not think Congress can limit the land holdings of an individual. It can, of course, limit the amount of land that an individual can purchase from the Government. I contend that this amendment is not germane, because it deals with a subject not embraced in this bill. It deals with the subject of private ownership of lands not acquired from the Government but from individuals. Therefore it is not germane to this bill.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, if I may be allowed a suggestion, the language of this amendment as it is presented certainly would operate only in futuro; it could not operate as to lands already sold, because lands already sold could not be acquired. This language applies only to the lands that are to be disposed of. Under the terms of the act as it now stands with the amendment that has been already accepted, the Philippine Legislature can dispose of these lands as it may desire. The gentleman now offers an amendment that not more than 2,500 acres can be acquired by any one individual. That places a limitation upon the act under consideration, and certainly must be germane. It seems to me there can be no question about its being germane to the bill that we have under consideration.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, just one word more. My remarks were predicated, of course, upon the statement of the gentleman offering the amendment. I asked him if his amendment applied equally to friar lands held in private ownership and those owned by the Government. The gentleman who has just spoken takes a different view from the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MORSE], who seems now to have changed his mind on the subject. I suggest to him that if he wishes his amendment to apply only to undisposed-of friar lands, he should change it so as to make his meaning clear. When one gentleman places one construction upon the amendment and another gentleman places a different one upon it, I must accept the construction of the gentleman offering it.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I did not know that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] was a mind reader——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman a question. Does this amendment mean that nobody shall acquire more than 2,500 acres of the unsold friar lands or that by no means whatsoever shall he acquire more than 2,500 acres of the friar lands which have been sold or may be sold?

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. My idea was that I could not limit the acquisition and make it germane to this bill unless it applied only to the unsold friar lands.

The SPEAKER. Then why not make the amendment say so?

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. I think it does. It refers to "these lands."

The SPEAKER. Let me read the language of the amendment:

Provided, however, That no individual shall be permitted to acquire more than 2,500 acres of these lands.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. That refers to the lands being disposed of under this bill.

The SPEAKER. If Members of Congress run afoul of each other about the meaning of this amendment, what is the reason that the court might not be somewhat confused about it, especially if the court consisted of more than one judge? A proposition that may be made clear ought to be made clear.

Mr. JONES. It could easily be made clear by making it refer to the lands unsold or undisposed of.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, let me call the attention of the Chair to this fact, that when the original law was passed, called the organic law, there was a provision which prevented a corporation from acquiring from any source more than 2,500 acres of land. I believe that was a wise provision and should attach also to an individual, but I recognize the fact that we are legislating only for these unsold friar lands, and with them in view I offered this amendment. It is not as extensive as I would like to have it, but I believe it is in order here. I believe it is germane, and I believe it is good legislation.

As to the reading, if the Chair thinks it would make the meaning clearer, I would be very glad to add the word "unsold," or have it refer to the unsold portion of these lands.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment as it would read with the words inserted.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, in line 21, after the word "holdings," insert:
"Provided, however, That no individual shall be permitted to acquire more than 2,500 acres of the unsold portion of these lands."

The SPEAKER. With those words inserted, the Chair will overrule the point of order made by the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I shall have to oppose this amendment, and I now ask unanimous consent that all debate upon the amendment be limited to 20 minutes.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I shall have no objection to that, providing I can have 10 minutes of that time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that debate on this amendment be limited to 20 minutes, he to control one half of that time and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MORSE] the other half. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire whether this is going to be the last amendment, or if the gentleman from Virginia intends to move the previous question after the disposition of this amendment, so as to have a vote upon the bill to-night?

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I give notice that I desire to move the previous question after we dispose of this matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I think everybody in this House by this time understands the meaning of this amendment. When we passed the organic act we provided that no corporation should acquire from any source—the Government or anyone else—more than 2,500 acres of land, and we did it to establish an agrarian policy there, the idea being that there was danger in large ownerships of land. Now, I realize the fact that even 2,500 acres is too large. I recognize the fact that 2,500 acres is too large an amount of agricultural lands. Understand, this does not apply to grazing lands, because these are agricultural lands almost exclusively. Now, the fact is that the law which limited the amount to 2,500 acres to a corporation was evaded, or if the law was not evaded, under the construction of the law which the gentleman from Indiana puts upon it and which the Attorney General put upon it, larger amounts than that were sold, nearly 60,000 acres going into one ownership. It seems to me that it is valueless to limit the amount of land that a corporation may hold to 2,500 acres when you permit the individual members of a corporation—the officers and stockholders—to acquire land in any amount that they may desire to acquire as individuals, because by so doing you defeat the very object of the act itself. I will, if I am given permission to extend my remarks, place in the RECORD the original act, known as the organic act, which limits the amount of land.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Yes; for a short question.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Is it the gentleman's idea that the amendment which he proposes would prevent the acquisition of more than 2,500 acres of land by individuals after the Government of the Philippines had parted with the land?

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Yes; that is the intention.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I would suggest to him, in my opinion it would not reach that. It is simply a limitation of the giving of land by the Government to occupants of this remaining territory.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. The gentleman's opinion and mine are at variance on that subject. I hope the gentleman is not right.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I would like to ask the gentleman also is it the gentleman's idea that this provision would prevent corporations from acquiring more than 2,500 acres of these remaining lands?

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. The provisions of the organic act prevent that. Now, if the gentleman from South Dakota understands in the first part of this bill we are enacting to-day we put all the friar lands in the same category as the other public lands, and the other public lands can not be sold to corporations. No kind of corporation anywhere in the islands can acquire from the Government or from private sources more than 2,500 acres of land. That is the organic act.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I suggest to the gentleman I believe that his amendment, confining that language to an individual, would probably be interpreted as not including corporations as to the remaining lands.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. We have taken care of corporations under that. The general law of the islands—the constitution of the islands—takes care of the corporations. Now, no man, it seems to me, can object to this legislation on the ground that the amount is too small. The idea of a large number of ownerships, the idea of homesteads, the idea of every man owning a piece of land and having a house over his head, a place he can call his own, will be carried out to a larger extent under a law which limits the holding of land to a reasonable amount than a law which permits the accumulation of a large amount of land by individuals or by a corporation. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES], I suppose, will urge that under our treaty with Spain we have not the power to do this. I have read the treaty most carefully, and when he reads the treaty I want the membership of the House to pay attention to that treaty, because I do not believe it possible to read into that treaty anywhere any words which affect the disposition or the control or ownership of land. That is a power that is inherent in every sovereign.

The State, the Nation, has the right by virtue of its sovereignty to protect itself and so frame its land policy, its agrarian policy, that it may prevent this thing which we have tried to prevent by the introduction of this bill, and in doing that we do that which the British Empire is endeavoring to do. In Ireland they are carrying out that same provision which was done only a few decades ago in Germany, and our States, many of them, have enacted laws to prevent corporations from acquiring more than a certain number of acres of land. These laws have been upheld not by virtue of the fact that the corporations had to get a charter but by virtue of the fact that the State had the right to protect itself on account of the powers that are inherent within a sovereign State, and I do not believe there can be a single question of constitutionality raised against this provision.

Mr. REES. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. RAKER). Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. With pleasure.

Mr. REES. Suppose a man had 2,000 acres of land and should acquire through inheritance a thousand acres more? While I can see your position might be to the advantage of the Government, it does not seem to go far enough. There ought to be some other provision to take care of the cases of that kind.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. I am inclined to think that the provision which would compel them within a reasonable time to sell might properly be added. I am inclined to think under a provision which, in the case of a foreclosure of a mortgage or in case of an inheritance, in those cases where the amount of land a man may acquire reached an amount greater than 2,500 acres, he would be required to sell the excess over that amount.

Mr. REES. Would it not be necessary to have such a proposition ingrafted?

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Possibly not in the act itself. Possibly in the administration of the act.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time. I ask unanimous consent, however, first to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting parts of the organic act.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MORSE] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting parts of the organic act. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman reserves the balance of his time, which is one minute.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I am inclined to think that the interpretation which the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN] places upon this amendment is the correct one. As a matter of fact, in my own mind there is no doubt upon that subject. But assuming that the gentleman from South Dakota is wrong and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MORSE] is right, then there are two objections which I have to this amendment. The first objection is this: This bill, as has been said over and over again during this discussion, seeks to apply the limitations of section 15 to section 65. I have always believed that those limitations now apply, but the object of this bill is to make it clear, and therefore the measure under discussion substitutes for the words "subject to the limitations and conditions in this act" the words:

> Under the same limitations and restrictions as are provided for in this act for the holding, sale, conveyance, or lease of public lands in said islands.

If this bill is passed, therefore, without amendment, it will make it clear that an individual can not purchase in excess of 40 acres of friar lands. This proposed amendment would be in conflict with that provision of the bill, and what would be the effect of its adoption I am not prepared to say. The bill would then contain a provision saying no individual could purchase friar lands in excess of 40 acres and another placing the limit at 2,500 acres. For that reason I am opposed to it. But my main objection to the amendment is that it seeks to limit the area of the land which one Filipino may purchase of another Filipino for all time to come if the land had ever been a part of the friar lands.

For instance, a citizen of the Philippines who happens to own 2,499 acres of land can never buy from another Filipino 2 acres of land if these 2 acres were ever a part of the friar lands. I do not believe this House will ever indorse such an unjust proposition as this. If this amendment is adopted, a citizen of the Philippines desiring to purchase lands which would increase his holdings beyond 2,500 acres, a hundred years hence, would be obliged to find out whether those lands were ever a part of the friar lands. If they had ever been a part of those lands, he could not purchase them legally. I am opposed therefore to the principle embodied in this bill. It is an infringement of individual rights. Congress has the right to say as to public lands that they shall only be sold to individuals in certain quantities. It can say this of the friar lands or any other Government-owned lands, but I doubt if it can say the same as to lands held in private ownership. It certainly should not so say. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MORSE], if he owned 10,000 acres of land in the Philippines, could say that he would not sell more than 50 acres to one individual, but I doubt if Congress has the power to say that for him.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I quite agree with the gentleman; but he rather answers what the gentleman from Wisconsin wishes in the amendment rather than what is in there.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman from Wisconsin not only wishes it, but he believes it.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Now, this provision refers to the land in actual occupancy there. The limitation would not refer to any individual in these other lands. In the judgment of the gentleman, ought they not to have a limitation in the lands of the Government as to the actual occupants of those lands?

Mr. JONES. Well, in my opinion the law now provides—and this bill does not seek to change it—that there shall be no limitation upon the holdings of actual occupants.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. It seems to be so interpreted, but should there not be a limitation upon that?

Mr. JONES. I think that a Filipino who is in actual occupancy of, say, 250 acres of land, which may have been occupied by his ancestors for a hundred years, and who is actually cultivating it, should be permitted to purchase it. I would not put any restrictions upon him. As a practical question, however, no limitation is necessary. I think no Filipino is now occupying any considerable quantity of the undisposed-of friar lands. I am opposed to the policy which the gentleman from Wisconsin wishes to establish by his amendment. I do not believe it has been adopted by any civilized people on the globe. Whatever may be the effect of the treaty of Paris, Congress should not attempt to impose the policy which this amendment is supposed to embody in the Philippines. The laws of Congress do not prohibit the buying of any number of acres of land in the District of Columbia, and I know of no State in the Union which puts a limitation on the land which an individual can acquire. The United States has for a hundred or more years placed the limitation of 160 acres upon a homestead entry. Congress can do this as to the public domain.

Mr. BUTLER. Let us have a vote.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MORSE] has one minute.

Mr. JONES. I move the previous question on the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Will not the gentleman move the previous question on the bill—on both?

Mr. JONES. There are no other amendments pending. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] moves the previous question on the bill and the amendments to final passage.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. OLMSTED. I understand if that motion prevails I shall have the opportunity to make a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The motion to recommit is in order when we get to the proper place.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MORSE].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. OLMSTED. I desire to make a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will suspend for a moment. The substitute of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] was pending, with a point of order against it.

Mr. JONES. I understood, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Colorado withdrew it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Colorado was going to withdraw it, but, as a matter of fact, he never did withdraw it.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I left the substitute pending, I will say, Mr. Speaker, just to give me the opportunity for a moment, if I am in order——

The SPEAKER. The previous question has been ordered, and that would cut off debate; but the Chair had forgotten about that, and if the gentleman does not withdraw it, of course the House will have to vote on it, provided the point of order is decided in favor of the substitute.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent to set aside the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to set aside the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Now does the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] withdraw his substitute, or does he want a vote on it?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if he will be so kind as to indicate the character of his motion to recommit. What I may do with reference to this substitute may depend somewhat upon the character of his motion.

The SPEAKER. Of course, this is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. OLMSTED. If permitted, I will say that my motion to recommit will be with instructions to report back the bill with an amendment at the end of it providing:

But nothing herein contained shall be construed to increase the amount of land which any corporation may hold.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman's motion does not shed very much light on my situation.

Mr. OLMSTED. That was not the purpose of it.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I left my substitute pending in order to give me an opportunity, if I so desired, to say something with reference to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED], which I think the House very mistakenly incorporated in the bill last Wednesday, permitting the Philippine Legislature to repeal or wipe out the limitations which this act seeks to impose upon the friar lands. In my judgment, Mr. Speaker, this House could, by two small amendments to the pending bill, absolutely wipe all of the Philippine lands from the statute books. One of these amendments was incorporated in the bill by agreement with the committee last Wednesday, and the other was overwhelmingly defeated by the House a little while ago—the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to permit citizens of the United States to acquire lands in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, this matter was quite fully discussed the other day.

Mr. BUTLER. And has been voted on.

Mr. MANN. And we have just ordered the previous question. I am not willing to stay here to have it discussed again after three days spent on the bill.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] can not feel half as reluctant as I do to consume a moment of the time of this House on this proposition; but I would like to have leave to say this, because I propose to make a motion to recommit, if I may, even if required to offer it as a substitute to the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania: That I believe if the amendment adopted by the House last Wednesday had been discussed like the amendment offered by the gentleman to-day, it would have been more overwhelmingly defeated than the amendment of the gentleman was defeated in this House not more than an hour ago, and I believe further, gentlemen, we ought in some proper manner to eliminate that amendment from this bill before it passes this House and is transmitted to the Senate. And I submit, whatever the parliamentary rights of the situation may be, it is not fair to this House, it is not fair to the interests involved, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] should be permitted to take advantage of the parliamentary situation and prevent another vote upon his amendment. If that amendment had been adopted in the Committee of the Whole, the opposition to it could simply call for a separate vote upon it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman could have reached the matter at any time to-day without any trouble. It is too late to do it now. I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the vote on the substitute of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, the Chair has not decided the substitute out of order, and I have not been called to order yet as not discussing the point of order against the substitute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] calls for the regular order, which is equivalent to an objection. This matter was proceeding by unanimous consent, and that is the only way in which it could possibly be debated, and he calls for the regular order, which ends the debate.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, the point of order I now make against the gentleman's amendment which I did make the other day——

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, the question before the House is my motion.

Mr. MANN. No; it is not.

The SPEAKER. No; the question before the House is the point of order of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED]. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. OLMSTED. My point of order is that the substitute amendment of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] relates to the public lands and every other kind of lands. The pending bill relates only to the friar lands, section 64. The gentleman's amendment relates to section 15 of the act, and not only relates to all kinds of lands but provides a system of escheats, an entirely different subject, and provides for penal offenses upon subjects totally different from the pending bill, and is therefore not germane thereto.

Mr. Speaker, the rule is that no motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under the color of amendment.

This bill is founded exclusively on section 65, which section relates only to lands in express terms on the face of it, lands purchased under the preceding section, which is the sixty-fourth section—purchased by the Philippine Government from private parties. New, section 15, which the gentleman's amendment proposes to amend, does not relate to these lands at all but to the lands purchased by the Government of the United States from the Crown of Spain. It is an entirely different matter.

The SPEAKER. As I understand the gentleman, this bill is confined entirely to the friar lands?

Mr. OLMSTED. Yes; to lands purchased under section 64, commonly called the friar lands. Section 15 relates exclusively to public lands acquired from the Crown of Spain.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Colorado desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, the previous question has been ordered.

The SPEAKER. But a point of order is always debatable if the Chair desires to hear gentlemen.

Mr. JONES. After the previous question is ordered?

The SPEAKER. A point of order is a point of order after the previous question is ordered as it is before.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I think I could return the compliment against the gentleman from Pennsylvania, for he has offered an amendment that corporations shall not be affected by the pending bill, not only in respect to the friar lands, but the public domain and lands in private ownership—all kinds of lands in the Philippine Islands. So, in effect at least, the proposition embodied by the gentleman from Pennsylvania in his motion to recommit is not confined alone to friar lands.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COOPER. Does the motion of the gentleman from Colorado relate to the amendment adopted a week ago?

Mr. JONES. No; it is on a different subject.

The SPEAKER. The Chair's understanding was that it was to be offered as a substitute for the bill.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Will the Chair permit me just for a moment?

Mr. Speaker, I believe my substitute is germane to the subject matter of the bill, because the bill in terms incorporates the friar lands into the public domain of the Philippine Islands. My substitute not only declares the limitations upon the land in the public domain to apply to the friar lands, but provides for an escheat back to the Philippine Government in all cases in which the limitations have been exceeded. Now, it would be a very small matter to change this amendment and offer it to section 65. I submit that the very character of the pending bill incorporating these lands into the public domain, so that the public-land limitations will apply without so stating on the face of the bill, makes the substitute germane.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will take judicial notice of the fact that from the very beginning of our occupancy of the Philippine Islands the Crown lands have been considered as one thing and the friar lands as another; and the rules and regulations touching the Crown lands are different from the rules and regulations touching the friar lands. This bill, which has been discussed for three days, has reference entirely to the friar lands. The substitute offered by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] not only affects the friar lands but it affects the Crown lands and every other sort of land that we own over there, if we own any; it also provides for an elaborate system of escheat, a subject that this bill has nothing in the world to do with. It also makes certain acts crimes, and provides penalties for the same. Therefore the substitute of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] is ruled out and the point of order made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] is sustained.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Am I in order to offer a substitute to section 65?

The SPEAKER. The previous question has been ordered and the amendment is out of order. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following motion to recommit with instructions, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers a motion to recommit with instructions, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. OLMSTED moves to recommit the bill H. R. 17756 to the Committee on Insular Affairs, with instructions to report the bill back to the House forthwith, with an amendment, adding at the end of the bill the words:

"But nothing herein contained shall be construed to increase the amount of friar lands which any corporation may hold."

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order against the motion to recommit that that is already the existing law in the Philippines, which fact the gentleman well knows. No one knows better than he that section 65 prevents the acquisition by a corporation of more than 2,500 acres of this land.

The gentleman knows the sales already made of these lands have been made under the guise of sales to individuals. If there was any one proposition contended for by the War Department, contended for by a majority of the Committee on Insular Affairs, contended for by the gentleman himself throughout the investigation of the sale of these friar lands, it was that this was a sale to an individual and not to a corporation, because they well understood that section 65 of the organic act protected these lands and all other agricultural lands, whether friar lands or public lands or private lands, from acquisition by a corporation to an amount in excess of 2,500 acres.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Colorado if the only point he makes against the motion to recommit is that it reenacts existing law?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, in my judgment this alleged motion to recommit is nothing more than a subterfuge. The gentleman has already altered it since he has read it to me for my information, by seeking to confine it to the friar lands. As the gentleman read that motion to recommit a few moments ago, it was not confined to any kind of lands.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, the question results in this, whether a motion to recommit can resolve itself into a mere sham to take the place of a genuine motion to recommit. This is made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, in my opinion, to prevent a motion to recommit to strike out the amendment which was adopted the other day, which never ought to have been adopted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] and all parties concerned that a motion to recommit, the previous question having been ordered, is amendable, but is not debatable.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a substitute for the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will entertain a substitute provided it is germane to the bill. The Chair overrules the point of order made by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] that the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is out of order because it reenacts existing law. If that were true it might be a superfluous performance, but there is no parliamentary rule against reenacting all of the statutes. The Clerk will report the substitute for the motion to recommit offered by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN].

The Clerk read as follows:

That the bill be recommitted with instructions to report the bill back forthwith, with an amendment striking out the following language inserted as an amendment after the word "Islands," on page 2, line 6, to wit:

"Unless the Philippine Government shall hereafter provide otherwise by appropriate legislation either generally or as to any specific tract or tracts."

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, on that I move the previous question.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the motion to recommit offered by the gentleman from Colorado attempts indirectly to do what could not be done directly by the House—in other words, to strike out an amendment already adopted, upon which there are several authorities if the Chair cares to hear them. It has been ruled over and over again by various Speakers and Chairmen, that what has once been put into a bill by the House can not, either directly or indirectly, be taken out again.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I make it in order to broaden my information on the subject. As I understand the rule, after the bill has been engrossed and read a third time but one motion to recommit can be made.

The SPEAKER. That is true.

Mr. HILL. And if this substitute is offered it is indirectly making two motions to recommit.

The SPEAKER. It has been decided over and over again by Speaker Carlisle, Speaker Crisp, and I suppose all the rest of the Speakers, that a motion to recommit either with or without instructions is amendable, and of course that embraces a substitute, for a substitute is a species of amendment. In fact, it was ruled squarely once that it did embrace a substitute. Of course this condition attaches to it, that the matter in the substitute must be germane, that it would have been germane or in order as an amendment when the bill was pending.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that there is a very easy parliamentary way out of the difficulty. In the first place, the gentleman for two days might have moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. But the gentleman voted against the amendment and had no right to move a reconsideration.

Mr. MANN. It was adopted on a roll call. It was easy enough to get somebody to move to reconsider the vote. In the second place, I do not think the gentleman's substitute is germane to the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to recommit, but I do believe it would be germane to move to recommit the bill with instructions to strike out all after the word "that" and insert the following; that is, insert the original bill.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I offer the amendment suggested by the parliamentary luminary from Illinois. [Applause.]

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that two substitutes can not be in order at the same time.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I am offering the original bill as a substitute, with instructions that the original bill be reported back forthwith, and on that motion I move the previous question.

Mr. OLMSTED. I make the point of order that two substitutes are not in order at the same time.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. And I withdraw my first substitute.

Mr. OLMSTED. I object to its withdrawal.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I offer the original bill——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado withdraws his first substitute——

Mr. OLMSTED. I object to its withdrawal.

The SPEAKER (continuing). And offers the original bill. He has a right to withdraw his original substitute.

Mr. MANN. I understand the gentleman offers instructions to report the amendment by striking out all after the word "that" and insert the following?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Certainly. [Laughter.]

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. OLMSTED. Is the gentleman from Colorado entitled to withdraw an amendment or a substitute against which a point of order is pending? Can he withdraw it without unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. He has as much right to withdraw that as any Member has to withdraw an amendment he has offered in the House.

Mr. OLMSTED. But can any Member withdraw it except by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. He can in the House, but he would have to have unanimous consent in the Committee of the Whole or in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on my motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will entertain that in a moment——

Mr. OLMSTED. I desire to be understood——

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman suspend for just a moment?

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to lose my right to object to the amendment as not being germane to my motion to recommit and that it is otherwise out of order to strike out of a bill that which the House has put in. I do not want to lose that opportunity.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will not lose the opportunity. The gentleman from Colorado moves the previous question on his substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause in the original bill and insert the following:

"Be it enacted, etc., That section 65 of an act entitled 'An act temporarily to provide for the administration of the affairs of civil government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes,' be amended so as to read as follows:

"'SEC. 65. That all lands that have been or may hereafter be acquired by virtue of the preceding section shall constitute a part and portion of the public domain of the Government of the Philippine Islands, and shall be held, sold, and conveyed, or leased temporarily, under the same limitations and restrictions as are provided in this act for the holding, sale, conveyance, or lease of the public lands in said islands: Provided, That all deferred payments and the interest thereon shall be payable in money prescribed for the payment of principal and interest of the bonds authorized to be issued in payment for said lands by the preceding section, and said deferred payments shall bear interest at the rate borne by the bonds. All moneys realized or received from sales or other disposition of said lands, or by reason thereof, shall constitute a trust fund for the payment of principal and interest of said bonds, and also constitute a sinking fund for the payment of said bonds at their maturity. Actual settlers and occupants at the time said lands are acquired by the Government shall have the preference over all others to lease, purchase, or acquire their actual holdings within such reasonable time as may be determined by said Government, without regard to the extent of their said holdings.'"

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that is not germane to my motion to recommit or to the amendment contained in my motion, and, furthermore, it is an attempt to do indirectly what the House can not do directly, and that is simply to eliminate an amendment which the House has already voted into the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I take it that the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is germane to the bill if the bill is germane to the amendment. [Laughter.] I recollect in this House on one occasion when the House after consideration of a long bill in the Committee of the Whole House, where various amendments were adopted, that the gentleman in charge of the bill when it came back to the House offered an amendment striking out all after the word "that" and presenting to the House again whether it would pass the bill with amendments inserted in the committee or whether it would pass it without the amendments inserted in the committee. Now, the House has a right to vote upon the proposition to pass this bill with an amendment that has been inserted or to vote to pass it in the form of the bill as it came in the House without the amendment it inserted. That gives the House the latitude of determining—in fact, the very purpose of the motion to recommit, in the first place, was to permit the gentleman in charge of the bill, where an amendment had been inserted or some error had crept into the bill, himself to move to recommit with instructions in order that the error might be corrected or the amendment be eliminated.

And since my service in this House of Representatives, until the rules of the Sixty-first Congress were adopted, it was the practice of every Speaker to give to the gentleman in charge of a bill prior recognition, if he asked for it, on the motion to recommit, because the original purpose of that motion was to permit the gentleman to correct the bill. Now, here is a situation where the House, having gotten beyond the point where a change can be made in the bill except by unanimous consent or a motion to recommit, and the House desiring to correct a mistake in the bill, the motion to recommit comes in for the very purpose of permitting the House to vote as it desires to vote. [Applause.]

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a word regarding the point of order made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED]. It seems to me we ought not to forget that there is a right recognized, as the Chair very well stated recently in a very notable case, of precedence on the part of a member of a committee to make this motion to recommit. That has been made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED], who has been recognized by the Chair.

Now, if it shall be allowed that another Member of the House can, by an entirely different motion to recommit, offering it as an amendment or as a substitute, have it take the place of the one already offered by the gentleman who had the right of precedence, it deprives the latter of that right. And I desire to make this suggestion to the Chair by way of illustration. In the case recently before the House, where the Chair recognized the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] as entitled to the right of precedence to make the motion to recommit, one motion only being allowed, would it have been proper for the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to have moved to offer his motion as a substitute and to have the right to a vote of the House on his motion to recommit?

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The "gentleman from Illinois" would not only have had the right himself to do it, which would have been exercised to offer a substitute for the motion of my colleague from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], if my colleague had not moved the previous question and if the House on roll call had not adopted the previous question. We tried to defeat the previous question, for which I think the gentleman [Mr. TOWNER] voted, in order that I might offer a substitute for the motion to recommit.

Mr. TOWNER. But has not the previous question been ordered here?

Mr. MANN. Not on the motion to recommit.

Mr. TOWNER. Very well. That not being the condition, let me make this suggestion: If that be true, then there is no possible benefit to be derived by any gentleman having the right of precedence to make a motion to recommit.

Mr. MANN. It permits, in any case, a roll call.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on my motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will rule on this question.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I would like to be heard.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman, although——

Mr. OLMSTED. That being the case, I do not care to be heard. [Laughter.] However, if the Chair is inclined the other way, I would like to be heard.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is very much inclined the other way.

Mr. OLMSTED. Then I would like to be heard. In the first place, Mr. Speaker, this bill in the very concluding words of it, as it now stands, permits the actual settlers to acquire their actual holdings without regard to the extent of their said holdings, and my very proper amendment, which I insert in that motion to recommit, provides that that shall not be construed to give corporations any authority to hold more than they are now authorized by law to do.

Now, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] very wittily says that if an amendment is germane to a bill the whole bill is germane to the amendment. That is perfectly absurd, Mr. Speaker, as any man may readily see. Suppose you have an appropriation bill here with 200 sections in it. If an amendment is germane to one section of the bill, is the whole bill germane to that amendment? Never in the world. It is perfectly ridiculous. Here is an amendment of mine which is limited strictly to the holdings by actual occupants and settlers, provided, if they happen to be a corporation they can not hold more than the law now provides as to a corporation. It is a perfectly legitimate provision, and no sham, notwithstanding what the gentleman has said. The proposed substitute covers a whole lot of other things that are in the bill now, but that does not make them germane to my amendment with reference to corporations.

And I want to call attention to some authorities. I find in the Manual, at page 382, a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. What page?

Mr. OLMSTED. Page 382. The motion, after the motion to recommit—may be amended, as by adding instructions—

And so forth—

but it is not in order to propose as instructions anything that might not be proposed directly as an amendment.

Now, does anybody contend that it would have been proper at any time to-day for the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] or any other gentleman to rise in his place and move to strike out the amendment that was put in a week ago to-day? That is all that his motion to recommit does.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question. Suppose the House or the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union inadvertently included in a bill a proposition that it is not willing to stand for, but is in favor of all the rest of that bill. Has the House no remedy except to go on and either vote for or against the bill unchanged?

Mr. OLMSTED. The House has no remedy except under the rules. There was no inadvertence about it in this case. It was on a yea-and-nay vote that that amendment was put in by a majority of three to one. Under the rule on that day or on the succeeding day a motion to reconsider would have been in order. But after that there is no way by which that can be got out of the bill except by unanimous consent or by defeating the bill.

Those are the precedents, uncontradicted for a century. It is not in order to propose by way of a motion to commit with instructions anything that could not be proposed in the House as an amendment to the bill.

Now, there are rulings by Speaker Carlisle, by Speaker Cobb, and by Speaker Reed to the effect that anything that has once been put into a bill by a vote of the House can not be taken out of it. You can add to it, but you can not take it out. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], I am sure, must be familiar with those precedents. I have read them all during the day. If the Chair overrules this point of order, he will overrule a line of precedents set by all his predecessors from the foundation of the Government. You can not take this amendment out of the bill without violating the rules and the precedents. This proposed motion to recommit takes nothing out of the bill and proposes no change in it except to eliminate that amendment.

Now, I just happen to have here——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman another question. Was the gentleman here on the day at the extraordinary session of this Congress when we had up the publicity bill, so called, and there was a large membership of the House in attendance, and it was a very hot fight, and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. JACKSON] offered an amendment, which was adopted, and a few minutes afterwards the chairman of the committee having the matter in charge moved to recommit, with instructions to the committee to report it back forthwith, leaving out the Jackson amendment? Nobody raised any objection to it; the committee did immediately report it back without the Jackson amendment, and the House voted on roll call to sustain that action.

Mr. OLMSTED. That was all right. There was no point of order made. Furthermore, it was on the same day on which the amendment was adopted, and it amounted practically to a reconsideration, which can be made on that day or on the succeeding day, but it can never be made again. That is what this amounts to.

Now, here is a ruling of Speaker Crisp on a motion to recommit with instructions:

The Chair is of the opinion that it is not competent to do by indirection that which could not be directly done; that it is not competent for the House to direct the committee to do something which the committee itself could not do by reason of a rule restricting it from such action.

That is by Speaker Crisp. If I had the time, I could cite half a dozen rulings to that effect.

The SPEAKER. What is that?

Mr. OLMSTED. That is section 5533 in the fifth volume of Hinds' Precedents. The motion was made by Mr. De Armond, of Missouri, to recommit with instructions.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think the rule laid down by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] is absolutely correct, and you can not offer a motion to recommit to insert anything that would not have been in order as an amendment. That is too well settled to controvert. But here was a proposition where the House in the consideration of a bill inserted an amendment in the original text of the bill. It was quite in order in the House at any time to have moved to strike out that portion of the text including the amendment and to have inserted in lieu thereof something else. It was quite in order, as was done in this case, for the gentleman to offer his substitute, which is an amendment, after the entire consideration of the bill, except the substitute, has been concluded. Now, the substitute is a mere amendment. We had presented to us—ruled out of order because it was not germane, but still with the right to offer it—a substitute amendment to this bill, and the substitue amendment might have been precisely the same amendment now proposed on the motion to recommit. The rule is—

An amendment in the nature of a substitute may be proposed before amendments to the original text have been acted on, but may not be voted on until such amendments have been disposed of.

The SPEAKER. Where is the gentleman reading?

Mr. MANN. I am reading from the Manual, page 397, section 805—

When a bill is considered by sections or paragraphs an amendment in the nature of a substitute is properly offered after the reading for amendment is concluded.

You can offer a motion in the way of a substitute when the first section or paragraph is read. You can offer it during the consideration of the bill and have it pending, or you can wait until the House or the Committee of the Whole has concluded the perfecting of the original text of the bill and then offer a substitute, which is an amendment. Now, that is all the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] has done. He now proposes an amendment, which is, in fact, a substitute for the bill and, being an amendment, would have been in order as an amendment, and, being in order as a amendment, is in order as a substitute. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I am personally indifferent as to the fate of the amendment which was voted into the bill by the House. I voted for the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania because I saw no objection to it; but upon the parliamentary situation, it seems to me that as a common-sense proposition the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] is correct. I have not the precedents at hand. The amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania was put into the bill not by the vote of the committee, but by the vote of the House, if I remember correctly, upon a roll call. It represented the deliberate judgment of the House, presumably. It would have been in order, if any gentleman who voted for that amendment had changed his mind, to move to reconsider, and that would have been the regular and orderly way in which to proceed. But now we have what amounts to practically a motion to reconsider by a gentleman who voted against that amendment. It is a motion for a new trial, not under the rule of reconsideration, but by one who stood then as he stands now, after the deliberate judgment of the House has once been taken on a roll call upon the amendment. When is there to be an end to these propositions? Had it been in committee the situation would have been different, I concede; but the judgment of the House having been once taken, is not the submission of the motion to recommit simply giving to the gentleman the right to move to reconsider when he would not have had it under the regular rules of the House. I submit that to the consideration of the Speaker. It seems to me the common-sense reasoning of the proposition lies with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED].

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, may I call the attention of the Chair to another authority? I had a whole list of them here, but some one has disarranged my papers. But I will call attention to section 5531 in the fifth volume of Hinds' Precedents. The previous question had been demanded on the passage of a bill. A motion was made to recommit the bill with instructions to report the Senate bill for which this substitute had been adopted.

Mr. William M. Springer, of Illinois, made the point of order that the Senate bill was the text that the House had stricken out, and it was not in order to direct the committee to report that which the House had just rejected.

The Speaker, Mr. John G. Carlisle, sustained the point of order and held that it was not in order to move the recommitment of a bill with instructions to report matter which would not be in order if offered as an amendment in the House; that is to say, it would not be in order because the House had passed on it already. The House had just voted to strike out the text of the Senate bill and insert a new proposition, and it was not, therefore, in order to do directly by way of recommitment that which could not be done directly by way of amendment.

That covers both my propositions.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman what he has to say about the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], that during the consideration of this bill, at any stage of it, it would have been competent to have moved to strike out any language in the bill, including this very amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, which was put in the bill.

Mr. OLMSTED. It is possible that some amendment of that kind might have been found, but this is not that amendment. This does not strike out anything but my amendment.

Mr. MANN. The Speaker does not know that.

Mr. OLMSTED. The Speaker does know it, because it appears from the reading of the amendment and the bill. If they proposed to strike out something else which my amendment perfected, that might be in order, but they do not propose to touch anything but my amendment, and that can not be done under the rules and precedents of this House.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GARRETT. I will withhold the motion for a moment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I call the attention of the Chair to Jefferson's Manual, page 244, where, in reference to amendments, it is provided:

> After A is inserted, however, it may be moved to strike out a portion of the original paragraph, comprehending A, provided the coherence to be struck out be so substantial as to make this effectively a different proposition, for then it is resolved into the common case of striking out a paragraph after amending it.

Then there is a citation there that may be in the gentleman's favor.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and Mr. GARRETT and Mr. OLMSTED demanded a division.

The House divided.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, pending the announcement of the vote, the previous question having been ordered on the bill, if the House adjourned, would it not come up to-morrow as unfinished business?

The SPEAKER. No; it would come up next Wednesday, the previous question having been ordered.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. This bill having occupied three days, will it come up on next Wednesday?

The SPEAKER. It will come up next Wednesday as unfinished business, the previous question having been ordered. The Chair would like to state that this is an exceedingly important question to be ruled on, and as far as the Chair knows it has not been raised for years, and the Chair hesitates a good deal about making an offhand ruling on a question that involves a fundamental proceeding of the House. On this vote the yeas are 53 and the noes are 44. The yeas have it, and the motion to adjourn is agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Accordingly the House (at 6 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, May 16, 1912, at 11 o'clock a. m.

Resolutions adopted by the representatives of the Polish-American societies in South Bend, Ind., May 13, 1912.

Whereas in the past the people of the United States have shown their sympathy with revolutionary movements for the establishment of democratic principles in other countries and also rendered substantial financial aid to such movements; and

Whereas Senate bill 3175, known as the Dillingham bill, provides for the deportation, without judicial hearing, of any alien who conspires for the overthrow of a foreign Government, and so makes it obligatory on our Government to send back, in many cases to certain death, not only the leaders but many of the humble followers of such movements; and

Whereas this same bill and House bill 22527, known as the Burnett bill, in providing for a literacy test for incoming aliens will not give this country any additional protection against the diseased, defective, and criminal classes and, contrary to the established policy of the country, would exclude many victims of social and political oppression: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, the Polish-American citizens of South Bend, Ind., urge the Members of the Senate and House of Representatives to prevent the enactment of said bills into law; and be it further

Resolved, that copies of these resolutions be sent to the President of the United States, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, and the Indiana Members of the House of Representatives and Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. I present a memorial signed by Henry W. Blair, well known to many Members of this body, and president of the National Anti-Third Term League, of Washington, D. C. I ask that the memorial be printed in the RECORD, if there be no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The memorial is as follows:

MAY 14, 1912.

To the Congress of the United States:

Respectfully represents your petitioner, president of the National Anti-Third Term League, of Washington, D. C.

Believing that the framers of the Constitution acted wisely in providing after long and careful deliberation that the term of the President should be for the period of four years, and that the unwritten law which prohibits any person to hold that office a third term should be made a part of the written Constitution, I do respectfully petition that during the present session you will submit to the States for their action a joint resolution proposing to amend Article II of the Constitution so as to provide that—

"No person who has held the office of President for two terms, or for any part of two terms, whether consecutive or otherwise, shall thereafter be eligible to be chosen to the office of President or Vice President."

Permit me to respectfully ask attention to the following considerations:

1. It should be in the power of the people to secure the services of a good President for two terms, or not exceeding eight years in all.

2. There is danger that the executive power would become too formidable to the other departments of the Government and to the liberties of the people if concentrated in even the most able and patriotic hands for more than two terms.

3. The hope of one reelection would stimulate the President to the wisest and most patriotic endeavor during his first term, whether really safe and fit for the office or otherwise.

4. During his first term the policies and measures and the official organization of administration would naturally be so fashioned that it would be difficult for even an unpatriotic Executive essentially to change them during a second term.

5. Frequent elections, or the power to recall or reelect officials, are essential to the preservation of our institutions. Impeachment is no practicable means of removing bad high officials, and the people ought not to be compelled to endure the burdens and perils of an incompetent or dangerous Chief Magistrate or of a party or policy which they disapprove for more than a single term of not exceeding four years.

6. Too frequent elections are burdensome to the people and produce weariness and indifference in the exercise of the primary duties of sovereignty.

7. There is no precedent, no test of experience in State or Nation for the restriction of the Executive to a single term, long or short, except in the constitution of the Confederate States, which would favor a shorter rather than a longer term.

Washington, Jefferson, Jackson, Lincoln, McKinley, Roosevelt, and other Presidents are on record in solemn disapproval of more than two terms, either "in form or substance," for themselves or any other person, and such was the expressed personal judgment and preference of President Grant, who yielded his own to others.

8. A third term initiates revolution in our form of government, leading directly through anarchy to monarchy and despotism. The war of 1861 was waged to divide our country into but two sections, both republics. The third term will insure the utter dissolution of the Union and interminable war before order is restored under a monarch or czar.

For these reasons I believe that the term of four years, fixed by the fathers and working well in practice for a century and a quarter, is the best which can be adopted. And your petitioner will every pray.

HENRY W. BLAIR,
President of the National Anti-Third Term League,
Colorado Building, Washington, D. C.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5624) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 19238) to amend section 90 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, and for other purposes.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. BURNHAM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 18960, the agricultural appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 18960) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the discussion of the agricultural appropriation bill has gone, it seems to me, far afield of the real question involved in it, and that is the question of the appropriation necessary to be made to carry on the work of the Forest Service for the current year. Inasmuch as it has so drifted, and many strictures have been indulged in with reference to the policy itself, and differing somewhat from the views expressed by my colleagues, I have felt that I ought to discuss the broader questions involved in the conservation of our natural resources as incident to the subject under consideration.

One of the Senators in his remarks expressed the hope that this would not drift into a political discussion, alleging that the question is not political and ought not to be, but is far above politics, involving, as he claimed, the very life of some of the States. I am in accord with him in expressing the hope that it will not be considered from a political standpoint at all, and that it will be considered from the broader economic viewpoint that is involved in the whole subject of the conservation of our natural resources.

Mr. HEYBURN. Will the Senator pardon me for interrupting him thus early? Does the Senator refer to the remarks which I made?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am referring now particularly to the remarks by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. HEYBURN. Oh. I considered it a political question, not a partisan one.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Some Senators do consider it a political question. I do not, and I think the consensus of opinion is that it is a great economic question. So I am in accord with the Senator from Wyoming in expressing the hope that it will be considered from this broader standpoint.

There is another reason why it should not be considered as a political question or as a partisan question. Both the great political parties of this country are committed to the question of the conservation of our natural resources. In order that there may be no question about that, I ask, without reading, to have embodied in what I have to say the plank of the Democratic Party adopted at Denver in its last national convention on this subject, as well as the plank adopted by the Republican Party in its national convention at Chicago.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

REPUBLICAN PLATFORM, 1908—CONSERVATION OF FORESTS.

We indorse the movement inaugurated by the administration for the conservation of the natural resources. We approve of measures to prevent the waste of timber. We commend the work now going on for the reclamation of arid lands, and reaffirm the Republican policy of the free distribution of the available areas of the public domain to the landless settler. No obligation of the future is more insistent and none will result in greater blessings to posterity. In the line of this splendid undertaking is the future duty equally imperative to enter upon a systematic improvement upon a large and comprehensive plan just to all persons of the country of the waterways, harbors, and Great Lakes, whose natural adaptability to the increasing traffic of the land is one of the greatest gifts of benign Providence.

DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM, 1908—NATURAL RESOURCES.

We repeat the demand for internal development and for the conservation of our natural resources contained in previous platforms, the enforcement of which Mr. Roosevelt has vainly sought from a reluctant party; and to that end we insist upon the preservation, protection, and replacement of needed forests, the preservation of the public domain of home seekers, the protection of the national resources in timber, coal, iron, and oil against monopolistic control, the development of our waterways for navigation, and every other useful purpose, including the irrigation of arid lands, the reclamation of swamp lands, the clarification of streams, the development of water power and the preservation of electric power generated by this natural force, from the control of monopoly; and to such end we urge the exercise of all powers—national, State, and municipal—both separately and in cooperation.

We insist upon a policy of administration of our forest reserves which shall relieve it of the abuses which have arisen thereunder, and which shall, as far as practicable, conform to the police regulations of the several States wherein the reserves are located, which shall enable homesteaders as of right to occupy and acquire title to all portions thereof which are especially adapted to agriculture, and which shall furnish a system of timber sales available as well to the private citizen as to the large manufacturer and consumer.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Both these great parties have declared unequivocally in favor of the conservation of the natural resources of the country, and therefore here at least it ought not to be considered from a partisan standpoint, if platforms are intended to mean what they say and are not to be abandoned as soon as a particular set of officials of the one party or the other get into power.

I take the position, Mr. President, that the Forest Service has been criticized, and very severely criticized, for a condition of things for which it is not at all to blame. I am willing to agree with both the distinguished Senators from Idaho in some of their criticisms. I am free to admit that in many individual cases the rangers on the forest reserves are too arbitrary. I am willing to go even further than that, and to say that in the administration of the land laws of the United States not only are the subordinate officers sometimes too arbitrary, but this criticism applies as well to the heads of the land and many other departments. Technical and arbitrary rulings not infrequently make it impossible for a man to perfect his title to public lands, where he is making an honest endeavor to acquire a home.

I am also willing to agree with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] when he repudiates the suggestion that every man who attempts to secure a home in the West is a thief, and I only differ from him in this respect, that I do not think that that charge is generally made. Whenever and wherever it is made it is usually by persons who do not understand the situation in the West.

An investigation will disclose that where individuals have been guilty of fraudulently acquiring lands under either the homestead or preemption acts, and in a great many cases under the timber and stone act, they have been the homeless hirelings and agents of timber syndicates or others in the East who have been interested in acquiring a part of the public domain for speculative purposes. These agents are, as a rule, not citizens of the West. They are in many instances tramps, though I regret to say that sometimes reputable people have been sent from eastern cities by timber syndicates and lumber companies to acquire title under the public-land laws, conveying these titles when acquired to their employers for a prearranged consideration.

I do not propose to appear here as the defender of the forester or of those who are under him for his or their arbitary or unjust acts. But I believe, Mr. President, Democrat as I am, in seeing that all of them, Republicans though they be, get a square deal so far at least as is possible for one or two of us to see that they get that square deal. I think that they have been unfairly and unduly criticized in the discussion of this bill, and I shall not hesitate to fix the responsibility for the frauds that have been perpetrated against the Government where it properly belongs, and incidentally to show that the conservation movement had its inception in a desire to stop the further looting of the public domain. The Forest Service is but an agency to that end and they are trying to do their duty even if they do make mistakes occasionally.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I suppose the Senator means that they are appointed by the Republican administration, but they are not all Republicans, because some of them have not, in my opinion, been naturalized.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I will not agree to the charge that some of the employees in the service are not naturalized. Under the rules of the department and under the civil-service regulations it is the duty of the department to appoint men from the classified service, and from the locality where the examinations are held, and in most of the cases these young men who are criticized as wearing cockades in their hats and showy uniforms to terrorize the people are appointed generally, if not from the immediate community, at least from the State in which they perform their duties.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. PRESIDENT——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield further to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I do not know what the experience of the Senator from Oregon is, but I believe that the majority of the appointees in the State of Idaho never saw the State of Idaho until they received their appointment. This is true of the Forestry Bureau in our State, and it is true of the majority of them. We have some few there at the present time who lived in Idaho prior to appointment, but the majority of them, as if you will look at the list you will see, were never there until they received their appointment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That may be true in Idaho, Mr. President, but if it be true, then the rules of the department and the rules of the civil service have been violated in respect to that particular State, and timely complaint should lead to correction.

Mr. JONES and others addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield first to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield to whoever first addressed the chair.

Mr. JONES. I simply wish to suggest to the Senator that his statement that these employees are Republicans is hardly a fair statement and is hardly borne out by the last suggestion he has made that they are largely appointed under civil-service rules. I do not believe that the partisanship of the parties is taken into consideration at all.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I used the term in the broader sense of the word. I meant that it was under Republican administration, and I do not want to even hold the Republican administration responsible for all the bad things that are done by any of the departments of government.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. WARREN. I think if the Senator will look at the present force he will find that it is composed of both parties; it may be more largely of the Democratic Party than the Republican Party, and that is not saying anything against or for them, of course.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the senior Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I wish to say in regard to the Senator's statement that the men are universally appointed from the State in which they are to serve; that, of course, I am not aware of the situation in the Senator's State, but in Wyoming that is far from a correct statement of fact. As a matter of fact, very few are appointed from the State in which I live, and for the very good reason that the people who live there, the residents, are largely practical men. They know how to fight fires; they know how to perform the duties of a forest ranger, but not many of them are able to pass or have passed the examination that is necessary to admit them into the Forest Service. I assume that to be true because there are so many who, if they could have gotten there, under the rules, would have done so. As a matter of fact, they do not come from the State in which they are appointed so far as Wyoming is concerned.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If I am wrong, my information from the department is wrong, and before the discussion is closed I will, if an opportunity offers, request the Forester to write me a letter on the subject, and I will ask to have it embodied in my remarks. If I am wrong, I certainly do not intend to be, and I leave my statement to be corroborated or disputed by the statement of the Forester.

Now, Mr. President, I make the broad statement that the Forestry Bureau and the Agricultural Department are not responsible in the first instance for the wrongs which have grown up under the forest-reserve system. Congress itself is and has been responsible, and it is responsible now, wherever these evils exist, for it has it in its power to correct them, and it ought to correct them. As a matter of fact, there has not been a single piece of constructive or corrective legislation suggested except on the floor of the Senate in the heat of discussion, and that has not had the consideration it ought to have had when it affects so great a national question.

The act authorizing the President by proclamation to create forest reserves was passed March 3, 1891. The creation of these reserves was recognized as almost a necessity at that time, and the President proceeded, in pursuance of the power vested in him, to create these reserves in order to protect the great wealth of timber and mineral resources against monopolization by those who wanted to acquire them for speculative purposes.

In the creation of these reserves it became necessary, Mr. President, to include lands that were owned by entrymen under the several Federal statutes, railroad and wagon-road grants, and others who had acquired holdings before the reserve was created. Now, let us note the evolution and development of a great national wrong under an act that was beneficent in its purposes.

Occasionally there would be a homestead near the top of a mountain or on a mountain side or in an isolated valley at the time of an Executive proclamation creating a reserve. These holdings were, of course, not extinguished by the creation of the reserves; but where there was one private holder or one entryman under the land laws there were hundreds of thousands of acres that belonged to railroad and wagon-road grant companies and others who, through mesne conveyances, had acquired title from them.

Then began to be heard a plea in behalf of the poor entryman, who had a home in the center of a reserve without possibility of having any neighbors or churches or schools; that he ought to be protected, and allowed to surrender his little holding in the reserve, which could never be otherwise than isolated; and that he should be permitted to select in lieu thereof other lands outside of the reserve, where he would have the benefit of neighbors, schools, and churches. That was a plausible plea for the entryman; and nobody on earth could object to allowing that entryman to release his land to the Government of the United States and to select in lieu thereof an equal area in some other part of the public domain. The same plea is being made for the poor settler now as a reason for abandoning the forest reserve policy. It looks ominous, Mr. President. The unwritten history of that plea is, that it originated, not by the fireside of the poor entryman, but in the office of a great railroad company in the Middle West; it was gotten up, not for the benefit of the small holder but for the purpose of enabling the big grant corporations, railroads, and others, and their successors in interest to release their holdings within the forest reserves, and to take up in lieu thereof other vacant Government lands in other sections of the country, which were far more valuable for all purposes than were the lands within the reserves. This was the origin of the indemnity selection or lieu land law. It was conceived in iniquity and resulted in robbing the people of untold millions in land and money. On June 4, 1897, Congress passed what was known as the indemnity selection law, ostensibly in the interest of the entrymen who had his home within the forest reserve, allowing him and incidentally all others who had holdings within the reserves to release their holdings to the Government and to take up lands elsewhere in lieu of the lands which they might surrender to the Government..

Bear in mind that this law, ostensibly in the interest of the settler, was not confined to him. It would have been harmless with such a limitation. But it applied to the grant companies of all kinds and their successors in interest and millions of acres of land in these reserves, consisting of lava beds, denuded forests, and rugged peaks, were released under the act of 1897 to the United States, and lands valuable for agricultural purposes, for timber, for minerals, for coal, and for oil, surveyed and unsurveyed, were taken up in every State in the Union where there were vacant lands by these companies that hastened to surrender their holdings within the reserve and to take advantage of a law which it was pretended was in the interest of the settler.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I ask the Senator from Oregon to what particular scrip he now has reference?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Generally. It did not make any difference, Mr. President, but I will speak of specific cases before I conclude.

Mr. BORAH. Upon whose recommendation, so far as the Forestry Bureau was concerned——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Forestry Bureau was not in existence in 1897.

Mr. BORAH. Upon whose recommendation, so far as that kind of a subject was concerned at that time, was this work done? Does the Senator from Oregon not know that those who were interested in conservation at that time earnestly advocated the proposition of making these forest reserves a whole, an integral, and eliminating all these lands from exchange?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I beg your pardon. The conservation movement was then only in its embryonic state; it had not developed into any attempt upon the part of the conservationists to do any specific thing. It was because of the releases of these holdings within the reserves and the taking of valuable holdings out of the reserves in lieu thereof that gave birth, or at least impetus, to the conservation movement in its present form.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. When these holdings within the forest reserves were given up and other lands were taken, upon what basis of valuation was the exchange made?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Absolutely none. They took anything; they could surrender a lava bed upon the top of the Cascade Mountains if within a reserve, go into any section where there were unappropriated public lands, and take up anything they could find, and the land did not even have to be surveyed.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Acre for acre?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Acre for acre.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, I have been curious to know how such a thing as that occurred. I have unlimited confidence in the Senate and the other House of Congress, not only now, but during all the years that have gone, and I should like to know what explanation there is in a body of honest men recklessly leaving the bars down so that such a thing as this could occur?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If the Senator will take the trouble to look back at the record, to the history of this legislation, he will find that in nearly every case the clauses authorizing these things to be done were slipped into the sundry civil appropriation bill or into the agricultural appropriation bill without any discussion, except as it might have taken place before the committee. That is the way the thing happened; but I am charitable enough to believe that Congress did not see at first the far-reaching effect of inserting these indemnity selection clauses in those appropriation bills. But if Congress was blind, the representatives of the grant companies were not. They knew and foresaw that what did happen would happen, and that what was ostensibly in the interest of the settler would be of much more vital interest to them.

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. To whom does the Senator from Oregon yield?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] first addressed the Chair, and I yield to him.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I would suggest to the Senator that at the time of the passage of the law to which the Senator has referred, granting the right to select lieu lands outside of the forest reserves for lands within, there were not very many private holdings within those forest reserves; but I know in some of the States, after the law was passed and was in operation perhaps for four years or more, there was a move made by men to enter lands and to make selections in forest reserves under State selections that were not agricultural in character, and the selections were made with no other view than to have them turned back to the Government, and in lieu of them to select lands outside.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will come to that, too, Mr. President.

Mr. SMOOT. I know that it happened in many States. I know that it happened in my own State. Men there made State selections, never thinking that the lands which they selected would amount to anything, but they were selected to secure lieu selections.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think that is true in some instances, Mr. President.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, for my own information I should like to ask the Senator from Utah a question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. By what process did your State select lands within known reserves? That is a question in which I am very much interested, and I want to know how it is done.

Mr. SMOOT. They did not select within reserves.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. How, then, could they get scrip for lands within the forest reserves and locate elsewhere?

Mr. SMOOT. We had school lands in all the reserves.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I know about the school lands.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, they can be selected, and the ones to which I have reference——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The State does not select its school lands; the law fixes what the school lands shall be.

Mr. SMOOT. I meant the entryman selected that particular school section and received title for it from the State, as the State had already received title to it when she received her lands from the Government.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I thank the Senator. I was asking for information.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I think it would tend to a clearer understanding of just how this abuse came about to repeat a brief statement made by the late Senator from Montana, Mr. Carter. He said that in the construction of the act of 1897 the Secretary of the Interior made a ruling that was obviously correct, that it never was the intention of Congress that the railroads holding arid lands under their early grants should be permitted to surrender them wholesale and to take certificates that would enable them to file on better lands elsewhere in the United States. That ruling was accepted by the railroads for a number of years. Subsequently, Mr. Hitchcock, of Missouri, came to be Secretary of the Interior, and, without any sort of foundation for his action, he reversed that ruling and permitted the surrender of the railroad grants and the selection of lands elsewhere. Arkansas fell a victim to the extent of 270,000 acres of land to that ruling made by Mr. Secretary Hitchcock.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think, Mr. President, that is probably true, and I am willing to assume that Congress did not intend the act of 1897 to have as broad an application as was afterwards given to it, but, whether it did or not, it did have that application and it did have the effect that I now say was given to it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. Was the act of 1897 a part of an appropriation bill?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CUMMINS. And all the things which the Senator suggests have been done under it. It seems to me that it is a very fine object lesson just now that ought to lead the Senate absolutely to set its face against any legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is not all, Mr. President; and I want to be distinctly understood as not charging any Senator in the past who participated in the enactment of these laws with having intentionally done anything unfair or unrighteous against the people of this country, even though it might be truthfully charged that they were exceedingly careless in the discharge of a duty of the highest responsibility.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Knowingly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Knowingly; but it was done; and as a result of it, the people have lost not thousands but millions of acres of land in almost every State in the Union.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The Senator has looked this matter up and proves himself to be well informed, and I want to find out what I can about it. How long was this looting process in being executed, and how comes it that after the discovery of this abuse the law was allowed to remain in force?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will show you, Mr. President, that Congress did know that this looting process was going on. Now, mind you, the act of 1897 had no restrictions at all. Anybody who had land within the reserves created by the President could upon relinquishing the same go and select other lands anywhere, whether surveyed or unsurveyed, provided only they were vacant and were owned by the United States.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I should like to ask the Senator if previous to the act of 1897 the wagon-road grants and railroad grants of which the Senator speaks were then in existence?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. All of them were in existence?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. All of them.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Previous to the act of 1897?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. What was the proportion of private holdings to these land grants at that time?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. A mere bagatelle.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If the Senator is acquainted with that legislation—I was then in the other House, but my memory fails me very badly in regard to this matter—is it not true that every bit of this whole question of trading these railroad lands within reserves for land outside emanated from the department, just as everything about these forest reserves to-day emanates from the department, and is done because of the influence and the statement of facts presented by the department? Take the then Territory of Arizona—and I will not interrupt the Senator further—to which my colleague [Mr. ASHURST] alluded the other day; take the vast forest reserve of Coconino, which takes up almost all the taxable part of Coconino County. The railroads there owned vast tracts of land; a Dr. Perrin bought those tracts from the railroads after they had been denuded of all their timber, and the proposition came from the department that, in order to make this forest reserve one solid piece, instead of cutting it up like a checkerboard, other lands be selected outside; and it was resolved by Congress upon this information that the only way they could conserve the land was to give those people loose scrip, and they proceeded to go to California and to other States and put it on the best timber lands in the world. That all came about through the suggestion of the department itself.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I am going to show the Senator after awhile that he is a little bit mistaken about that, and that some of it originated in his own State, although in the final analysis the responsibility for a great crime rested upon the Department of the Interior and not upon the Forestry Service, which was not then in existence.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I say it all originated in the department, in my judgment, for the very gentleman I am speaking about was the one who got the land through the Interior Department.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will come to that a little later on and will call the Senator's attention to a resolution of his own legislature and petitions from chambers of commerce and citizens in his State in reference to this very proposition.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That only makes it worse.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; but the Senator is estopped and the Senator's State is estopped from saying that the department did all the wrong, if his people or any of them assisted in inducing that to be done which was done and which is conceded to have been wrong.

Now, Mr. President, proceeding with what I was saying awhile ago, I want to show that Congress did know a little later that they let down the bars for the looting of the public domain, because in the acts of June 6, 1900, and March 3, 1901, also included in appropriation bills, they again legislated upon the subject and limited the right of selection to surveyed lands, thus cutting out the right of the entryman and of the grant corporations and their successors in interest to select unsurveyed lands in lieu of lands released in the reserves; so that Congress must have been advised in time to have stopped the nefarious business. I will say to the Senator from South Dakota that they began to realize that they had thrown down the bars too low, and they wanted to restrict the power of these people and companies who had lands located within the reserves to the selection of lands which had been surveyed in lieu of those which they were surrendering. This was only a partial restriction and did not correct the evil.

Mr. CRAWFORD. What year was that?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That was in the act of June 6, 1900, and the act of March 3, 1901.

That is not all, Mr. President. This thing had become so notorious and so infamous in every western State that a demand went up everywhere that this old indemnity selection law should be abolished and repealed. What happened? On the 3d of March, 1905—I want the Senate to notice the wording of this repealing clause—there was passed and approved "An act prohibiting the selection of timber lands in lieu of lands in forest reserves," which is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the acts of June 4, 1897, June 6, 1900, and March 3, 1901, are hereby repealed so far as they provide for the relinquishment, selection, and patenting of lands in lieu of tracts covered by an unperfected bona fide claim or patent within a forest reserve.

If they had stopped there the act would have repealed the indemnity selection acts and would have stopped the looting of the public domain; but it goes on:

But the validity of contracts entered into by the Secretary of the Interior prior to the passage of this act shall not be impaired: Provided, That selections heretofore made in lieu of lands relinquished to the United States may be perfected and patents issue therefor the same as though this act had not been passed, and if for any reason not the fault of the party making the same any pending selection is held invalid another selection for like quality of land may be made in lieu thereof.

Here was a qualified repeal of the indemnity selection acts that were on the statute books at that time, but it excepted from the effect of the repeal contracts which had been made by the Secretary of the Interior. Now, I want to call your attention to what that innocent little exception meant to the people of this country.

It so happened that citizens of some of the States had petitioned for the creation of certain reserves shortly before that repealing act, and amongst other States the State of Arizona.

The Grand Canyon Forest Reserve, the first reserve established in Arizona, including the Grand Canyon of the Colorado and the Coconino Plateau, was established by President Harrison on February 20, 1893, following the recommendation of Secretary of the Interior Noble, based solely upon a report by Director Powell, of the United States Geological Survey.

It was about four years after the creation of this reserve that there was first presented to the General Land Office a definite and formal expression of public sentiment in favor of the extension of forest reserves to include and protect the watersheds and forests generally in Arizona. This expression was in the form of a memorial by the Legislature of Arizona dated May 5, 1897, praying that a sufficient area of the unclaimed and unappropriated timberlands in Arizona be set apart to retain needed water supplies in the interest of irrigation in that Territory. The memorial was assompanied by numerously signed petitions by citizens of Arizona praying for the reservation and protection of the timber in the San Francisco Mountains.

It will be noted——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Will the Senator permit an explanation right there?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. At that time we were attempting to cover all the lands we could in the Salt River Valley that are now covered by what is known as the Roosevelt Dam. There was a question whether the most populous of the whole Territory was to be run by railroads and private owners, cutting the timber from the San Francisco Mountains, which were alleged to be the original water supply of that valley, and this came up in the excitement of that time—whether or not they could cut the dead timber and whether or not that would so denude it as to affect the water supply. That was a local question with the people.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I appreciate the explanation of my good friend, the Senator from Arizona, and I understand fully the needs of his people at the time of which he speaks. I am not disposed to blame them for their course, but I simply wanted to call attention to the fact that a petition in favor of forest reserves to include the watersheds and forests generally in Arizona came to the Secretary of the Interior from the Legislature of Arizona, as well as numerously signed petitions from citizens of that State, praying for the reservation and protection of the timber in the San Francisco Mountains.

The following persons and corporations had large holdings within the San Francisco Mountains Forest Reserve:

The Aztec Land & Cattle Co., the Saginaw & Manistee Lumber Co., William F. Baker, Messrs. Robert and E. B. Perrin, and the Santa Fe Pacific Railroad Co.

These were the people who owned lands within the San Francisco Mountains Reserves and within the Grand Canyon Reserve.

When the question arose as to the creation of this reserve, Binger Hermann, Commissioner of the General Land Office, made report and recommendation to Hon. E. A. Hitchcock, the then Secretary of the Interior, under date of August 12, 1898, and inclosed to him drafts of proclamations to establish the San Francisco Mountains and Black Mesa Forest Reserves. He recognized in his report the great public danger of including in these reserves the private holdings of individuals and corporations and allowing them to be used as the basis for indemnity selection, and called the particular attention of the Secretary of the Interior to this danger in the following language:

This question of the relinquishment to the Government of private holdings within forest reservations and the selection of unreserved lands in lieu thereof is assuming grave proportions and is a matter that will need very careful consideration by this department. It is showing itself in a number of different aspects, and I am giving the subject consideration with a view to presenting the matter to the department later. In the meantime it is important that the reservation in question should be made without delay. To guard against any complications that might arise by the inclusion of a large area of railroad lands, I deem it advisable that the region which includes lands granted to the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad should be put into a separate reservations; and I have, accordingly, prepared a proclamation reserving, in express terms, the even-numbered sections in the townships falling within the grant to the railroad, said reservations to be known as the San Francisco Mountains Forest Reserves, said sections containing a total estimated area of 975,360 acres. This makes a separate reservation of each even-numbered section, all grouped and known under the general name of the San Francisco Mountains Forest Reserves.

The lands below the granted limits of the railroad company I have embraced in a separate proclamation, describing the boundaries in the usual manner, the reservation to be known as the Black Mesa Forest Reserve, and embracing an estimated area of 1,658,880 acres.

It will thus be seen that in order to avoid this very danger he suggested, and there was created, what was known as the "checkerboard" reservation, by means of which the boundaries of the reservation cut in and around private holdings within its exterior limits, so that such holdings could not be used as the basis for indemnity selection. As soon as this was done, the Secretary of the Interior was besieged by interested and other parties to acquire title to these private holdings, so that they might be included within and become a part of the reserve. Negotiations were instituted by the Secretary of the Interior with the owners, whose names I have already given, which resulted in the abolishment of the "checkerboard" system, the acquirement of the private holdings by the Government, and the consolidation of the reserves, so that the persons whom I have mentioned were given the right to make selections in lieu of the lands surrendered by them to the Government.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I think the holdings of the companies of which the Senator speaks, and also of Dr. Perrin, to whom I alluded awhile ago, that all the holdings of the Saginaw Company and others, were railroad lands, and it was the simple question of the railroad companies——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That does not alter the proposition I am urging here now. They bought them from the railroad companies and occupied practically the same position with the same right to indemnity selection as the railroad companies had.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I feel that in justice to the citizens of the county in which I then lived and in which the lands are situated I should say that my colleague [Mr. SMITH] when in the House protested against the wicked act of the Secretary of the Interior; that private citizens, at their own expense, came here and appeared before the Secretary of the Interior; and it was done over the protest of the citizens of Coconino County, and over the protest of my distinguished colleague, who was then representing Arizona in the House of Representatives as a Delegate from the then Territory.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I believe that is true, and that my distinguished friend did protest against it as did others, but it was done by Mr. E. A. Hitchcock, then Secretary of the Interior, in the face of all protests, and the railroad and lumber companies and others surrendered to the Government of the United States lands which, in many instances, were absolutely denuded of timber and got the right to select other lands out of the public domain in lieu thereof. It was to protect these alleged contracts that the repealing clause in the act of 1905 excepted the contracts that the Secretary of the Interior had entered into with various private individuals. It did not name them. It would not have been policy to have named them in the repealing clause, because it would have aroused a protest in and out of Congress against legislation which had for its purpose the protection of the Santa Fe Railroad Co. and others instead of the protection of the citizens of the country.

Let us see how the contracts were protected by that repealing clause.

I might say, incidentally, that in 1910 I offered a resolution in the Senate calling on the Secretary of the Interior to furnish to the Senate of the United States not only a list with the description and location of the selections which were made under these contracts, but also the description of the base used. The response to this resolution is given in detail in Senate Document No. 612.

There was protected by that innocent little clause in that repealing act, excepting these alleged contracts, for the Santa Fe and other concerns which I have named, 1,264,862.75 acres of land. In other words, by those contracts there was given to these companies over a million and a quarter acres of land, in lieu of the turned-over land, while the lands selected were the best lands in Oregon, California, Arizona, and elsewhere. The States in which the selections were made are Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, California and Colorado, Florida, Idaho, Louisiana, Michigan, Minnesota, Mississippi, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Mexico, North Dakota, Oklahoma, Oregon, South Dakota, Washington, Wisconsin, and Wyoming.

In other words, these companies and persons released to the Government of the United States lands which had been denuded of timber and selected lands in 22 States of the Union wherever they could find lands which were valuable, and usually they were timbered lands.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. I wondered whether the Senator has a list of the lands affected by a bill introduced in Congress after the repeal of the law, asking that they be given the same privilege of exchange. Has the Senator the list in the document he has?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No.

Mr. SMOOT. The bill did not pass, but it was asked for.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is a wonder they did not, because they usually got all they asked for.

The Aztec Land & Cattle Co. selected 127,000 acres in round numbers; I am not giving the exact number; William F. Baker, of San Francisco, selected 76,000 acres; Robert and E. B. Perrin selected 132,000 acres; and the Saginaw & Manistee Lumber Co. selected 39,000 and more; the Santa Fe, 439,226 acres; the Santa Fe Pacific selected 380,000, and so on. I will give the list in detail later.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think, under the circumstances, it would be a little bit enlightening at least to know who was Secretary of the Interior at that time, and whether these protests were brought to the attention of the President at that time as well as of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The old Latin maxim, de mortuis nil nisi bonum, appeals to me in this case. I want to observe it as far as it is possible consistent with the truth. It was Mr. E. A. Hitchcock who in his lifetime seems to have assumed that every man who undertook to acquire title to public land was a thief, and yet he was a party to the scheme, which I have described, to give away over a million acres of land by contracts he could have refused to make. Commissioner Hermann had called attention to these very dangers and had recommended the checkerboard arrangement for reserve creation, and he was removed from office at the instance of Mr. Hitchcock, as many believe, because he did not stand for these things but for the interest of the people of this country in reference to these indemnity selections.

Mr. WARREN. Do I understand the Senator to claim that these selections were made contrary to law?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. These last selections?

Mr. WARREN. The million-acre selection of which he speaks.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think there is a very grave question whether they were legally made or not.

Mr. WARREN. At the time the question was up—and I know it was discussed for days and days—we had a hearing before the Public Lands Committee, and the consensus of opinion of that committee was that it was under that law that these selections were made, and as soon as it was brought to the attention of the Senate the Committee on Public Lands recommended the passage of a law repealing it; and after that I know that there were another million acres in different parts of this country filed upon by railroads and individuals who wanted a special act allowing them the same privilege, because they had released lands to the Government and the contract had not been made for the transfer; but that bill failed, as the Senator well remembers.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. When I introduced the resolution in 1910 asking the Secretary of the Interior to certify to the Senate of the United States the lands which were excepted by virtue of the alleged contracts mentioned in the repealing act he did not certify any contract or contracts, but a volume of correspondence covering 206 pages, as disclosed by Senate Document 612.

Now, it may be that the Senator from Utah could read this mass of correspondence and conclude that there was a contract between the Secretary of the Interior and these various parties; but I think it is very questionable if the Secretary of the Interior had authority to make a contract, or, even if he had authority, that he made a valid contract, and the proper forum to determine that matter is the court, and the proper officers to institute the proceedings to have that determined are the officers of the Department of Justice.

Mr. SMOOT. That can be done now.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Certainly.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I rise simply to make note of this fact, that the Senate, it seems to me, ought to notice. I refer to the outrageous discrimination and injustice that this grotesque policy works against a poor man with a family seeking a few acres of land for a home. It was during the period of this espionage, that treated every man with a family of children moving in a prairie schooner across the plains to get 160 acres of semiarid land for the purpose of building a home as a scoundrel, and the same administration that was putting this suspicion upon this humble seeker for a home was throwing the bars down for the Santa Fe Railroad Co. to select lieu lands in place of lava beds.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I ask a question here?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. Under what law did the Secretary of the Interior make any contract of the character that has been suggested by the Senator from Oregon? In other words, what authority has the Secretary of the Interior to dispose of public lands or give any interest in public lands, except in the way pointed out by the statute?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is the reason I sugegsted to the Senator that I had doubts whether it was a valid contract.

Mr. CUMMINS. Suppose it is a contract. What authority has the Secretary of the Interior to make any contract in regard to that?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not think he had.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then, of course, it is all void.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Under the act of 1891 the lands were withdrawn in the first instance, and the proclamation was issued creating these reserves somewhere along about the latter part of the nineties.

Mr. SMOOT. Precisely. I thought what the Senator from Iowa wanted to know was under what law the Secretary of the Interior had been given any right to make this exchange of lands in a forest reserve for lands outside of a forest reserve.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is under the act of 1897.

Mr. SMOOT. I was going to say that the act of 1897 granted that authority. The question asked was as to whether the contracts had been made and whether they were legal or not; but I think if the Senator will look it up he will find that the contracts had been made by the Secretary of the Interior under the act of 1897.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Oregon did not recite in detail the act of 1897, but, as I understood him, it was an act which permitted one who held land in a forest reserve to surrender that land and receive a certain sort of scrip, and that gave to the scrip the privilege of entering an equal quantity of land somewhere else.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CUMMINS. That law, however, gave to the Secretary of the Interior, if that is all there is of it, no authority to make any contract with anybody. It simply gave the authority to the holders of these lands in the forest reserves to surrender those lands. The Secretary of the Interior had nothing to do with the surrender of those lands except to take the surrender and issue the scrip, which in turn could be located upon land elsewhere. The sort of contract which is evidently contemplated in the 206 pages of forest contracts could not be a contract which arose out of the act of the parties under the law of 1897.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator has in mind just exactly the question that arose in my mind, and suggested to me the question as to whether or not these were valid subsisting contracts at the time of the selections.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is perfectly clear to me that they were not valid contracts, and that the Secretary had no authority to make them.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator this question: Have the selections already been made? Have the railroad company and the different parties named ever made a selection of land somewhere else on the public domain?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. They had not made the selection until after this so-called contract was executed, and before its execution the railroad lands had been included in a reserve, against the suggestion of Commissioner Hermann for a checkerboard reserve.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand that before the repeal of the law all the selections had actually been made.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No, sir.

Mr. SMOOT. As to the particular location of every piece of land. I do know that as to the 487,000 acres that were not allowed they claimed that they had transferred their right to the Government, but did not have time to make the selection, and therefore not having time to make the selection and having transferred their title to the Government they ought to be conceded the same rights as those who had made the selection. That is as I remember it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No; the selections were made of this one million and a quarter acres after the contract so called was finally agreed to.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. BORAH. As I understand the drift of the Senator's arguments—and if I understand it correctly, I am quite in sympathy with him—it is that by reason of a strained and unnatural construction the Secretary of the Interior permitted these transfers to be made, and the advantage which the corporation derived was by reason of exchanging lands which were practically worthless in a reserve for lands outside of the reserve. Is that correct?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; the Senator is correct.

Mr. BORAH. What I desired to know was, Is it the idea of the Senator that by reason of the construction of the Secretary of the Interior put upon these laws this was permitted to be done, and it was permitted to be accomplished under the peculiar construction which he gave to it?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is correst; but I am not willing to concede that he had the power. As the Senator from Arkansas said awhile ago, the construction placed on the act originally was that such selections were not contemplated under the act of 1897.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly. That is precisely the idea which I had. I say, therefore, it was a strained and unnatural construction and assumption of authority which in my judgment did not exist under the law at all, and it was by reason of that that he permitted it to be done.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If I understand the argument of the Senator from Oregon, the act of 1897 authorized the consolidation of the lands where lands in a reserve were owned by parties. Was not that predicated upon the right, then, of some one, either the Secretary of the Interior or the parties owning these lands, to select in lieu of the lands turned over to the Government lands elsewhere, and did not that carry in the very act itself something of the nature of a contract?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If the Senator from Oregon will permit me, when they turned these lands back to the Government the Government issued scrip, and the scrip usually described the kind of land on which it could be taken.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Within what limits?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Upon land anywhere in the United States under certain scrip. Under other scrip it was limited to certain lands. It might be scrip limited to a certain class of land, but under a roving general scrip you could locate anywhere.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That was the point I wanted to get clear. If the railroad company or individuals should own land within a reservation and gave the land up in order that the Government reserve might have continuity, then there was issued to the parties so surrendering this property scrip which gave them the right to enter elsewhere. What were the limitations on that strip?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There was no limitation at all under the act of 1897, for they could take surveyed or unsurveyed lands, timbered or untimbered, or agricultural, provided only it was Government land.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Without regard to the relative value of the two pieces?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Without regard to the relative value. Sometimes they surrendered lava beds that a crow could not fly over without a haversack to carry his rations, and took in lieu valuable timber lands, worth $100 to $200 an acre.

I ask permission, Mr. President, to insert here a list of lands selected in each State under these alleged contracts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Congress has a chance yet to get busy in the matter of indemnity legislation. These are not the only acts which have been working to the detriment of the people of this country and in the interest of those persons and corporations who have had lands in forest and other reserves. I am going to call attention now to something that was done later to show you that notwithstanding the conservation movement and notwithstanding the attempt to withdraw these natural resources from monopolistic control Congress has been granting still further rights to land-grant corporations.

By the act of February 20, 1893 (27 Stats., 1063), or possibly by proclamation of the President of that date, the Pacific Forest Reserve in the State of Washington was created. On the 22d of February, 1897 (29 Stats., 896), the President created the Mount Rainier Forest Reserve in the same State.

It is a question in my mind whether, when the President simply issues a proclamation declaring these reserves, a selection can be made in lieu of lands within the reserve without additional legislation, because as a rule the proclamation near the bottom of it excepts certain lands and rights from the effect of the proclamation. Notice what was done after these reserves were created. I call attention to this because the Forestry Service has been blamed for all of it.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. My recollection is, and I call the attention of the Senator from Oregon to it, that the Mount Rainier reserve was made pursuant to an act of Congress or a part of an act; that it was not created under the general law authorizing forest reserves to be created, but it was created under a special act. I have an impression, though I may be astray, that it was a part of an appropriation bill which contained that provision.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator may be right about that. I stated at first that it was an act, and then I was not sure but that it was a proclamation. The Senator is probably correct about the reserve having been created by an act of Congress. However, it does not make any difference for the purposes of what I am about to say. In any event the two reserves were duly created.

By virtue of the terms of the act of March 2, 1899 (30 Stats., 993), setting aside a portion of these two reserves as a public park—now, note this—the right was expressly given to the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. to select land in lieu of the lands granted to it by Congress and contained in the reserves above mentioned.

The act of 1899 had for its purpose, as disclosed by the title, the creation of a national park. That was the purpose of the act, and there is nothing in the title that disclosed anything to the contrary. Yet section 3 thereof contains this provision:

Section 3.—I want the Senators to notice this—

That upon execution and filing with the Secretary of the Interior by the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. of proper deed releasing and conveying to the United States the lands in the reservation hereby created, also the lands in the Pacific Forest Reserve which have been heretofore granted by the United States to said company, whether surveyed or unsurveyed, and which lie opposite said company's constructed road, said company is hereby authorized to select an equal quantity of nonmineral public lands, so classified as nonmineral—so classified as nonmineral at the time of actual Government survey, which has been or shall be made, of the United States not reserved, and to which no adverse right or claim shall have attached or have been initiated at the time of the making of such selection, lying within any State into or through which the railroad of said Northern Pacific Railroad Co. runs, to the extent of the lands so relinquished and released to the United States: Provided, That any settlers on lands in said national park may relinquish their rights thereto and take other public lands in lieu thereof to the same extent and under the same limitations and conditions as are provided by law for forest reserves and national parks.

Mind you, it does not say anything about timber lands, but simply nonmineral—

Mr. CRAWFORD. What is the date?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That act was passed March 2, 1899.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. I believe the Senator was thoroughly familiar with the passage of that act and the reason why timberlands were not mentioned. The question was discussed, and it was decided that the lands in Mount Rainier owned by the railroad company were timberlands. Does the Senator remember it that way?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The same claim is usually made that the lands which they were to surrender were very valuable. It was probably made here, whether true or false.

Mr. SMOOT. But I am asking whether the Senator really knows whether they were timberlands or not. I understood in this particular case that everyone admitted that they were timberlands.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think probably there were some timberlands, but I think if some one went through the park he would find a good deal of rock there, and a good deal of it absolutely precipitous and worthless.

Mr. SMOOT. I was not in favor of the law, and I did all I could to repeal it. I think it ought to have been repealed before it was. I am simply, in justice to the passage of this particular bill, saying that I have understood that it was conceded by all that they were really timber lands.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I hope the Senator will understand that I am not criticizing the Senate that passed the bill. I am calling attention to the facts as they are, and to a condition of things that gave birth to this policy of conservation, which is now being denounced in such severe terms, and by gentlemen who represent my section of the country more ably, I am sure, than I, and just as honestly as I try to do.

Now, note what was done.

Mr. BORAH. I do not understand that anybody from the West has been upholding this transaction.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No.

Mr. BORAH. Neither do I understand that they are criticizing the Forest Bureau for what the Senator is now discussing. I have always believed, and I took occasion to say the other day, that a large portion of this fraud and wrongdoing had its birth here in the department, and instead of prosecuting the people within the department they proceeded to prosecute the settlers upon the domain.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The questions are correlated. You can not deal with one without dealing with the other, showing that these frauds have given birth to this movement for the conservation of national resources, which I am now insisting should be retained until the whole public-land laws are codified, revised, and made to conform to conditions as they exist to-day.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. It seems to me that the explanation offered by the Senator from Utah hardly explains this last act. The Northern Pacific Railroad had a land grant covering a part of Mount Rainier. I think the land grant extended to the top of Mount Rainier, although I am not sure about that. The act simply gave to the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. the privilege of surrendering any part of its grant within the National Park and locating the indemnity scrip upon some other land. If the Northern Pacific had a good piece of timber land it would not surrender it. If it had a barren piece of land it would surrender it and take a better piece if it had an opportunity to make the location.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It did not have to release any unless it wanted to do so.

Mr. CUMMINS. So the option was given to the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. in that act to surrender perfectly worthless land and locate the scrip upon good land, either agricultural or timber land, as the case might be. I want the character of the act to be fully understood as we go along.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I admit that what the Senator says is absolutely correct, but does the Senator remember what the result was? Was it not all——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am going to tell you now.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Now, notice how skillfully that act is worded, Mr. President, in some of its essential particulars. The Northern Pacific Railroad Co. just had a little of its track in Oregon, running from Portland to Goble, about 18 miles. That is all the line of road it has in my State. Oregon had some of the most valuable timber land in the public domain at that time. They wanted this act to be so worded that they would not have to be confined to the State of Washington, but could go anywhere where their road happened to extend, and reach out and take a part of the public domain.

Now, notice this. They had the right of selection of lands lying within any State in which or through which the railroad of said Northern Pacific Railroad Co. runs. Those words "in which or through which" allowed the Northern Pacific to release the lands in the Rainier National Park and select lands in any of the Western States into or through which their road ran, and in Oregon, as I said, they had only about 18 miles. Now, what happened? The ink had hardly got dry on the signature to the act when the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. released in round numbers 450,000 acres of land to the Government of the United States and crossed over the line and selected a great portion of it in the State of Oregon. I have been informed, though I do not state it as a fact, that the Weyerhaeuser interests bought from the Northern Pacific Railroad the right of selection at the rate of $6.50 per acre, amounting in round numbers to nearly $3,000,000.

That was the result accomplished by the act of 1899. But that is not all of these indemnity selection acts.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Will the Senator pardon a question?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Has the Senator looked at this legislation to see whence this particular legislation emanated?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. You can never find out.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Were there not letters from the Interior Department; and, in fact, did not the Interior Department all through this legislation recommend the passage of the bills we are talking about in order to make a continuity and a oneness of the forest reserves?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator may be right, though I did not look into that feature of it. I really did not care where it came from. I wanted to call attention to the reckless character of legislation and to show what the conditions are as resulting therefrom.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I only asked for this reason——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I want to keep out of the RECORD altogether the question as to whether it was done by Democrats or Republicans. I want the Senate to act impartially and without partisanship in this matter, and if possible to legislate so that these wrongs can not be perpetrated in future, and corrections made now.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. In that sentiment I most heartily concur. Speaking from my experience as a Member of the other House and from my observation and reading of these matters, I want to emphasize the fact that if we did more of our own thinking and took less advice from gentlemen in the executive departments the West would have been far better protected than it has been. No inference I hope will be drawn that I am questioning the integrity of anyone; but I do question the ability of the Interior Department to tell the western Senators or western Representatives, or the western people, what is the best legislation for their country. This legislation crept through Congress by our taking the advice of the department instead of thinking for ourselves.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I am heartily in accord with the views of the Senator from Arizona. I might go just a little bit further, and say it has come to this pass here in Congress that you can not get through a piece of legislation, as a rule, if it is opposed by any of the departments, and you can not stop the passage of a law if it is recommended by a department. Congress has practically surrendered its right to legislate. That is not universally true, but it is pretty generally true. As an indication of that, I want to say right here that I am heartily in favor of the bill known as the Borah bill for the relief of the homesteaders in the West. That bill is tied up in conference now, I am informed, because the Secretary of the Interior can not have his way in regard to amendments which he wants. If I am mistaken about this, the Senators can correct me. This procedure is followed not only in that case but in other cases as well. It is well to have the opinion of these bureau officers as to the facts involved in certain legislation which is proposed, but they go beyond giving the facts, Mr. President, and send up their opinion or recommendation that a bill be passed or that it be rejected. We have absolutely surrendered our rights to bureaucracy in this day and generation, and sometimes letters upon which Senators and Members of the House of Representatives act are written by a clerk in one of the departments drawing a salary of $60 or $75 a month, and all the Secretary of that particular department does is to sign his name without reading. But that is a digression, into which I have been drawn by the Senator from Arizona.

Further, with reference to these indemnity selections, there is still an opportunity for the Senate to correct a few evils. If Congress will do more legislating and less criticizing, we can still correct a great many evils and stop a great many leaks so far as the public domain is concerned.

There is another indemnity selection law that is in force which I venture to say many Senators do not know anything about, and I am frank to say I did not until very recently. Power is given under certain acts to exchange lands within the limits of Indian Reservations for lands outside of such reservations, and by executive order the exterior limits of such reservation may be extended, and the same right of selection is given within such extended limits.

Mr. CRAWFORD. What reservations?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Indian reservations.

Now, I call the Senator's attention particularly to the act of April 21, 1904, 33 Statutes at Large, 211. So you see, instead of curing the evils which were pretended to be cured by the repealing act of 1905, we have extended the right in some cases to acquire more of the public domain, and under these extended limits of the Indian reservation there is now available as a base 2,013,346.22 acres, lands of individuals and others, which have been included in these reserves, that can be now used as a basis for indemnity selections; 433,130.70 acres have already been used, leaving practically a million and a half acres that can still be utilized as a basis for indemnity selections.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. NELSON. I have just looked up the statute and find that the Mount Rainier Forest Reserve was created by a special act of Congress of March 2, 1899, and the act indicates by its phraseology that a part of the land had already been withdrawn under an Executive order. This act, however, included more than the former withdrawal—it created the forest reserve of Mount Rainier National Park, and provided for lieu-land selections.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator from Minnesota is doubtless correct. I am frank to say that I was not particular about whether that reserve was created by a proclamation or by act of Congress for the purposes of my argument.

Mr. President, there are numerous other indemnity selection acts that I am not going to take up the time of the Senate in discussing. I have discussed them thus far for the purpose of showing conditions as they existed at the time this conservation movement had its origin. Lands in nearly all the States of the Union had been and were being taken up and placed under monopolistic control.

Mr. Gifford Pinchot, former Forester, has been denounced here as a despoiler by one of the distinguished Senators who has discussed this subject. Mr. President, I say to you that, instead of criticizing him as a despoiler, the American people ought to erect a monument in his honor and engrave his name upon it as the man who originated the idea of placing these resources of the Government—timber, coal, iron, and oil—beyond the reach of monopolistic control, and saving them, not only for the generous use of our own generation but for generations yet unborn, because to him more largely than to any other individual in this country it is due that the people of America were first aroused to the fact that our public lands and the things under them, including the water powers and everything else, were being taken up and monopolized by selfish interests. He aroused an interest and created a public sentiment that has made Congress do something to protect these natural resources. Therefore, even if I do agree with some of the criticisms which have been indulged in against the administration of the forest reserves, and with others that have been indulged in against other governmental bureaus, I must state that, in its larger view, Mr. Pinchot and those who have succeeded him have done a work that entitles them to the everlasting gratitude of the people.

Mr. President, we can see, in view of the looting of the public domain by these big corporations, why the idea of the conservation of natural resources had such an impetus given to it from the start. Really, it only sprung into importance in 1908, when the governors of the several States met here in Washington for the purpose of discussing the whole subject.

The growth of the conservation movement has been slow, but involving, as it does, a great moral question, it will never be retired from political or economic discussion until it has been rightly solved, and the party or the individual who opposes it must eventually be crushed by an outraged public opinion. So well is this recognized that you can not find anyone in public life upon whom responsibility rests in this important matter who will not claim that he is in favor of the conservation of our natural resources, and some there are who, while professing to believe in the doctrine, are nevertheless willing, on one pretext or another, to oppose any measure looking to the advancement of the cause.

It may not be inappropriate to call attention briefly to the evolution of the movement. As early as 1903 President Roosevelt appointed the Public Lands Commission. The first partial report of this commission was presented to Congress in a message by the President March 7, 1904, and the last was presented in the same way February 13, 1905. These reports deal at length with the antiquated land laws, and the abuses which have grown up under them, the sale of timber on the public lands, grazing thereon, and other kindred subjects. They contained many valuable suggestions, such as the repeal of the timber and stone act and the commutation clause of the homestead act. Attention was called to the frauds which had been and were being perpetrated under these laws, and if the recommendations of the commission had been followed by Congress a long stride would have been taken toward saving the public domain for the homesteader instead of allowing it to pass into the hands of speculators.

In 1907, the President created the Inland Waterways Commission and charged it with the consideration of "the relations of the streams to the use of all the permanent natural resources, and their conservation for the making and maintenance of prosperous homes."

Acting upon the suggestion of the Inland Waterways Commission, the President called a conference of governors of all the States and Territories, which was held at the White House in May, 1908. For the first time in history the executives of the sovereign States met with the Executive of the United States, and the occasion for that gathering was the consideration of the important problem of conservation. Acting upon the recommendation of the governors, all of whom recognized the importance of the great question they were called upon to consider, the President, on the 8th of June, 1908, appointed the National Conservation Commission, which thereafter proceeded to take the first inventory of the natural resources made by any nation in the world. The results of that inventory are recorded in the report of the National Conservation Commission, which the President transmitted to Congress with a special message in January, 1909.

Not only did Congress not then see fit to enact any legislation therein recommended, but unfortunately declined to print the report in sufficient numbers for its adequate distribution among the people. More disastrous than this, however, was the congressional enactment forbidding this or other executive commissions from pursuing their important work in the service of the people. This action, plainly designed to wipe out the National Conservation Commission, accomplished its purpose. It put an end to the activities of that commission, removing the only national organization which was dealing with the conservation question as a whole. Thus was presented the strange spectacle of a nation-wide movement, inaugurated by the governors of the States, the presidents of great organizations of our national industries, and other distinguished citizens, and heartily indorsed by the people of the country, by legislative enactment denied not only an appropriation, but even permission to continue its work.

That the conservation work is going on to-day is due to the approval of the people, crystallized into an organization formed by patriotic men and supported by individual citizens, whose desire it is that the conservation movement, to which such uniformly popular approval has been given, shall not fail, but shall go on until the principles for which it stands have been carried into practical effect. I refer to the National Conservation Association, the patriotic service of which to the Nation can not be too strongly emphasized.

I do not believe any Senator in these discussions has advocated or would advocate the release of the reserves; I do not believe the Senator from New Mexico, who insists upon State control, advocated the changing of the boundaries of any of them; I do not think either of the distinguished Senators from Idaho have insisted upon changing the boundaries of any of these reserves. Now, let us see what would happen if the policy were abandoned with the land laws in their present condition.

Mr. President, if we should abandon the present policy it would not be three months until every acre of timber in this country would be taken up by agents and hirelings of those whose interest it is to get them under monopolistic control. This is not guesswork. I call your attention to the very able argument of my friend, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], published in the Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science a year or two ago. He explained in a very few words how this was done then, and what he said would apply now:

> The mode in which these lumbermen have carried on their operations has been in the main, and in outline, this: They have in person or through agents and employees secured, by divers means, a large number of men and women in various parts of the country—people who knew nothing about such lands and who had no thought of acquiring the same—to apply to purchase and enter such lands, supplying them with money to travel from remote interior towns to examine and select the land and make the necessary application to purchase at the district land office, and supplying them with money to pay for the land, and then, after the purchase and entry were completed, procure a conveyance of the land to themselves for a moderate bonus. These dummy purchasers—for they were, in fact, in most cases nothing else—would be approached in the first instance like this: "I know where you can make some money by taking a timber and stone claim. It will cost you only $2.50 per acre, and you can easily sell it as soon as you get title for an advance of $200 or $300, or perhaps more." "But I have no money with which to go and examine and purchase the land." "That does not matter. I know a friend who will advance you the money and will take the land off your hands at a good profit as soon as you get title; but you must keep this matter to yourself." The temptation to make money in this easy way is so alluring that many act on the suggestion and thus become the instrumentality of the big lumberman. I remember how, a few years ago, a large number of lady school-teachers in a western city—the headquarters of some big lumbermen—were induced to "take up" timber and stone claims in Oregon, Washington, and California, more than 1,500 miles from where the teachers lived. Most of these lands afterwards passed into the hands of these lumbermen.
> A large portion of our timber lands in the Western States, outside of the Government forest reservations, has, in recent years, largely under operations such as I have mentioned, passed into the hands of large lumber syndicates, who have well-nigh secured a monopoly of our timber supply. There are still in various localities in the Western States bodies of timber land that ought to be preserved and conserved for the present and future welfare of the people of the United States. These lands ought not to be sold, but should be retained by the Government, and the timber on them should be conserved, and only the old and mature timber should, from time to time, be sold under suitable rules and regulations, to the end that our people may not become entirely helpless under the timber monopolies now hovering like a dark cloud over our country.

The charge of dishonesty is not against our western people, but against the representatives and hirelings of the big lumber companies and timber barons of the East, who sent school-teachers, as the Senator from Minnesota has stated, and people who were out of employment, to the West, paid their expenses out there, and got them to take up lands under the timber and stone act. Is not that so, I ask the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NELSON. The Senator is correct. The case I referred to in that article was one where a big lumber speculator who owns millions of acres in California, or some of his friends, induced a lot of school teachers in a western city to go and locate lands under the stone and timber act, and afterwards, in the cases where the entries were confirmed and allowed, the lands passed into the hands of that lumber man.

While I am on my feet, Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I beg leave to call attention to the law repealing the right to make lieu-land selections.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The act of 1905?

Mr. NELSON. The act of 1905, and I call attention to it in connection with a statement the Senator made a while ago. The act is very brief and is as follows:

> That the acts of June 4, 1897, June 6, 1900, and March 3, 1901, are hereby repealed so far as they provide for the relinquishment, selection, and patenting of lands in lieu of tracts covered by an unperfected bona fide claim or patent within a forest reserve—

Here is the language to which I call particular attention—but the validity of contracts entered into by the Secretary of the Interior prior to the passage of this act shall not be impaired.

As I understand, the Senator has examined this document and finds no contract. I remember very well when this bill——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Pardon me. Let me say right there that I do not say there is no contract. I have not read the mass of papers with the critical care that a lawyer would give them ordinarily, but I say, from a hasty reading, I would not call them, taken together, a contract.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator will allow me a little further in this connection—and I am not hostile at all to his view of the case—I remember very well when the bill repealing the lieu-land right of selection was before the Senate. I was a member of the Committee on Public Lands at the time, but not its chairman. I was heartily in favor of repealing the act, because I was familiar with the wrongs that had been perpetrated, to which the Senator from Oregon has called our attention. But while the matter was pending in the Senate, much to my surprise, attorneys appeared before the Public Lands Committee, claiming that they had contracts with the Secretary of the Interior in reference to forest reserves in Arizona. Those contracts were presented before the Committee on Public Lands. I did not think those contracts ought to have stood in our way, and I was in favor of an unconditional repeal, but it was evident there was so much opposition to that course that it was very doubtful whether we could pass any bill at all. I was, however, so anxious to have the bill passed repealing the lieu-land selections that I finally consented to it with those words in; but I thought then, and I still think, that the Secretary of the Interior had no right to make such binding contracts, and that we ought to have made no exception in the law. However, Senators who have been here for a number of years, and I might say also those who have been here for a short time, know that where there is a controversy legislation is oftentimes a matter of compromise. I was utterly opposed to that exception in this case, but I found we were in such a condition that if we passed a bill at all we would have to admit that exception, and I felt as though it were better to take part of a loaf than to have nothing at all.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator from Oregon will allow me further, I will say that I thought then, and I still think, that whether or not there was a contract with the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of the Interior had no right to make such binding contracts.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I will inquire what was the nature of the contract which it is claimed did exist, but about which there seems to be some uncertainty?

Mr. NELSON. I have no distinct recollection of all the details, but I remember that two or three attorneys appeared before the Committee on Public Lands and read to us what they claimed was a contract. The facts, as I remember them—and I am speaking by the leave of the Senator from Oregon—were that at that time in Arizona there was much rather poor land, with straggling timber on the mountain top, which had been practically denuded. After the timber had been taken off the lands were of little value, and the railroad company, which had a lang grant there of every odd section, induced the Secretary of the Interior to withdraw those lands and create a great forest reserve, including the grant of the railroad company. It is claimed that he did that with the consent of the railroad company, and that they consented to the inclusion of all their odd sections within that forest reserve. As a matter of fact, their consent was a mere perfunctory consent. In my opinion they were mighty glad to get rid of those rocks and hills and sands from which the few trees which once grew there had been stripped. They could hardly have sold those lands for anything to actual settlers at that time; the lands were considered of no value, and it was a godsend for them to get the Secretary of the Interior to make a forest reserve and give them the right of lieu-land selection under the law. So, they succeeded; but I did not believe at that time, nor do I believe now, that the Secretary of the Interior had any right to make such a bargain, and if he did make such a bargain I do not believe it is a valid bargain. The railroad company should not have been allowed to make any lieu-land selection.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I believe I was about to suggest what would happen if all these reserves were released. The distinguished Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], who understands the land laws as well as anybody in this body, showed in the article to which I have referred, that hirelings were sent from the East out into the West by the large lumber companies to acquire lands under the timber and stone act. They do not have to live on the lands to acquire title under that act; they simply go on the land, point out the corners, and make affidavit to that effect before the proper land office. I do not undertake to give the law in its essential details, but that is practically all it requires. Then they make the payment, get a final receipt, and in due course get title. That is the easiest law under which title can be obtained from the Government of the United States, and through it more fraud has been perpetrated against the Government than through any other instrumentality, unless it be the indemnity selection law.

If we release these reserves, Mr. President, there will be a horde of men go out from every State in this Union, paid by those who are interested in getting these lands under monopolistic control, and they will take them up under the timber and stone act, and as soon as they acquire title, deed them for an agreed consideration to the companies they represent. Just as soon as the strangle-hold of the Government is released there is no question as to what will happen. The best evidence of what will happen in the future is what has happened in the past. Let us look at what happened up the State of Washington.

There they had the Olympic National Forest, and in 1901 there were eliminated from this forest, upon the earnest petition of a great many people, 705,000 acres, on the ground that the land was chiefly valuable for agricultural purposes, as is claimed here—that the lands now within the reserves are all chiefly valuable for agriculture. Since the elimination, 523,720 acres have passed into the hands of owners who are holding it purely as a timber speculation. Three companies and two individuals own over 178,000 acres in holdings of 15,000 to over 80,000 acres each. Settlement has not followed. This is particularly true wherever there was any timber. Of the entire timbered area within this elimination not over 600 acres was under cultivation 10 years after it was opened to entry. The land is being held for the timber by the speculators who have acquired it.

That is a case where this thing has actually happened, if you can place any credence at all upon the statements of the forester and those in his employ.

Take another case. Just as soon as the Government released its strangle-hold on the Chugach Reserve in Alaska, distinguished gentlemen from New York and elsewhere went up there, not in person, but they had representatives there, and tried to get possession of the whole water front, and so great a scandal resulted from this attempted steal that it was finally nipped in the bud.

As another illustration of what is likely to happen, let me state another case. A few years ago, under a resolution passed by the Senate, the Attorney General of the United States instituted a proceeding in the State of Oregon to forfeit the land grant of the Oregon & California Railroad Co. because the grantee had failed to carry out the terms of the grant in that it sold the land in larger tracts and for larger sums per acre than were fixed in the act and to others than actual settlers. The suit had not progressed very far when bureaus were organized in St. Louis and other eastern cities to sell to parties who were willing to part with their money so-called preference rights to tracts of land within this grant as soon as the suit should be determined.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. That was a pure bunco, because the preference rights to that were absolutely worthless.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. True, they were worthless.

Mr. BORAH. Of course neither the Forestry Bureau nor Congress would be responsible for that kind of a confidence game.

The Senator is absolutely right that they went about selling these preference rights, but there were no preference rights to sell. They did not amount to anything. One might just as well have sold a man a piece of earth for a gold brick.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. By so much the more would people be willing to engage in these methods of acquiring public lands if by paying their money they could acquire a right which would be valuable if the reserves were released and the present policy abandoned. There would be more unscrupulous speculators organizing bureaus and sending people out into the West to take up land under the timber and stone act, in the way and manner so graphically described by the Senator from Minnesota, and for the purpose of turning it over finally to timber syndicates.

There is no doubt in my mind as to what will happen. Oregon has suffered a great deal from the looting of its public lands, and so far as I am concerned, whether there is a single man in the State who agrees with me or not, I want to see the lands, except those which are suited for agricultural purposes, held just as they are until the Congress can get together and enact a reasonable and consistent code of laws covering the whole subject of the disposition of the public domain.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator excepting agricultural lands, I would agree with him exactly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am glad the Senator agrees with me to that extent.

Mr. BORAH. I have expressed myself several times that if the agricultural lands were taken out of the reserve—lands which are actually agricultural—let them classify them, and classify them as agricultural lands if they are agricultural lands it would remedy one of the great grievances we have.

Mr. HEYBURN. And lands fitted for horticulture.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I know the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] is reasonable, and there is no one in this body who knows more about conditions in the West than the Senator does, but this classification can not be made in a year. It can not be made in two years. It can not be made in five years. But I think the Senator will give the Forestry Department credit for attempting in good faith to have these lands listed, and they have listed many of them in a good many western States. I am impatient that they do not do it faster in my State, for there are still some agricultural lands in these reserves that ought to be listed for homestead entry.

Mr. BORAH. Perhaps the Senator and I have both suffered from the same impatience, but mine in a more accentuated degree, and we are both troubled with the same state of facts. I know they have made some movement in that direction, and I give them credit for it. It does seem to me that in the long time that the act of 1906 has been upon the statute books, that there is a vast area in my State that could have been classified and because of my concern in actually asking for a classification, I feel some times that criticism is due them for being too slow.

There is not any possible way for the Government to be cheated in any of these transactions, because it is within its power to classify them and if the timber land is timber land it should not be thrown open to entry. If the land is agricultural land no man can be cheated if a man goes there and makes a farm. So it is not asking the Government to take any chance whatever. The Government does not throw itself open to criticism for hasty action or for loose action or for that which may result in a fraud because if there is any doubt about the land not being agricultural, the Government can resolve the doubt in favor of itself.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator and I are not very far apart about that. The only thing we would probably differ about is the amount of agricultural lands within these reserves. There is not a great deal of it in Oregon, and I should like to see the officials act more speedily than they do, but when one stops to think of the immense amount of land involved, constituting an empire in itself, it will be seen that it is a physical impossibility to get over it quickly.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I think I differ with the Senators who favor the classification of these lands by the Government. The person to classify the land is the man who is going to use it. He knows he has only one opportunity in his lifetime to select, and he knows whether or not he is going to select a piece of land which is going to waste that opportunity.

Agriculture is not the only consideration. There is horticulture. There are vast quantities of lands in forest reserves which would not make wheat fields because they have stumps and rocks and other objectionable features, but some of the finest orchards I have ever seen are in forest-reserve lands or lands similar to those within forest reserves.

Then again there is stock raising, stock breeding. Those industries do not necessarily prosper only on agricultural lands. Then there are shops for the manufacture of things; sawmills to supply the inhabitants with fence material and building material. They do not necessarily fall within the forest reserves.

Now, why confine it to agricultural lands and why send men to classify the lands who are not interested in their cultivation? Why send a man to classify them on behalf of the Government who knows nothing of the capacity of the settler to make a living and a home upon them? No bona fide settler is going to waste his one right to select public lands upon land that will not meet with his necessities or his pleasure.

A great many people want to live in the forest and only in the forest, and I would not live on an untimbered piece of land. I have never yet been tempted to take up any public land, but I would not under any circumstances live out in the open plain. I want trees and running streams and sloping land about me, such as those that exist in the forest. I might want to make an entry for the purpose of engaging in stock raising, or for the purpose of engaging in any of the arts and crafts outside of agriculture. Why should I not be allowed to do it? A homestead is not necessarily an agricultural tract of land. A homestead is where a man makes his home; and all men do not engage in raising crops. They may desire to engage in many industrial enterprises that would be upon the homestead. The trouble is we confuse the word "homestead" with an agricultural tract of land and the industry pertaining to it.

Now, if the Senator will just transpose the proposition so that the settler may, at the jeopardy of losing his right as a settler, select the land, then we would not be far apart.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I realize the force of what the Senator says, but we have to judge the future by what has happened in the past with reference to the timbered areas in the reserves. We know what happened down in the San Francisco Mountains Reserve, of which I have spoken, where the lands were owned by big companies. They cut much of the timber off—absolutely denuded the land; and the interest of the public is a larger interest than that of an individual. We must guard against a possible repetition of this wholesale plunder of the remaining public lands.

Much has been said about Canada and the liberal character of its land laws and their tendency to induce emigration from our own country. It is questionable if the Canadian laws are any more liberal than our own, but the law there is not the sole cause of the present migratory movement. Briefly, their laws provide that—

(1) Only agricultural lands are open to homestead there, and timber reserves are created and maintained there as here. No entry for a homestead conveys any right to salt, coal, petroleum, natural gas, gold, silver, copper, iron, or other minerals, within or under the lands covered by the entry, or any exclusive or other property or interest in or any exclusive right or privilege with respect to any lake, river, spring, stream, or other body of water within or bordering on or passing through the land covered by the entry. (Sec. 8, p. 3, the Dominion lands act.)

(2) The minister may, if he deems it necessary, require the holder of a homestead entry to furnish proof, by declaration or otherwise, that he is duly performing his homestead duties in each year subsequent to the date of his entry. (Par. 2, sec. 13, p. 7.)

(3) If an entrant for a homestead fails in any year to fulfill the requirements of this act in respect to homesteads, or the requirements of the laws in force in respect thereto when the entry was obtained, the minister may cancel the entry and all rights of the entrant in virtue thereof shall thereupon cease and determine: Provided, That any subsequent entrant for the same land may be required by the minister to pay in cash reasonable compensation for the improvements, if any, of the person whose entry is canceled; and that the minister may, in his discretion, pay to the latter the amount of such compensation, in whole or in part. (Par. 2, sec. 15, p. 7.)

(4) If entry is obtained for land which, though not reserved at the time, is ascertained to be valuable on account of merchantable timber upon it, the minister may, within six months of its date, cancel the entry. (Par. 4, sec. 15, p. 8.)

(5) If, after entry is obtained, it is ascertained that the land entered for, or any portion thereof, is necessary for the protection of any water supply or for the location or construction of any works necessary to the development of any water power or for the purposes of any harbor or landing, the minister may, at any time before the issue of letters patent, cancel the entry or withdraw from its application any portion of the land entered for, but where the land is required for the location or construction of works necessary to the development of any water power, only in so far as the land is necessary for that purpose. (Par. 6, sec. 15, p. 8.)

(6) Everyone is guilty of an indictable offense and liable to two years' imprisonment who buys, trades, or sells, or professes to buy, trade, or sell, land, or any interest in or control of land open to homestead entry, or for which homestead entry has been granted, before patent therefore has been issued. (Par. 9, sec. 15, p. 8.)

(8) Proof under this section shall be in the form of a sworn statement by the applicant, corroborated by the sworn statements of two disinterested parties resident in the vicinity, which statements shall be made before the local agent or the officer acting for him, or such other person as is thereunto authorized by the minister: Provided, That on any application for letters patent by the legal representative of the entrant, or by his assignee, or by the guardian or committee of an entrant who has become insane or mentally incapable, or by a person who in the event of such an insane entrant's death would be his legal representative, the minister may receive proof of the facts in such manner as he sees fit to require, and, upon being satisfied that the claim has been proved, may allow the claim and cause letters patent to issue accordingly. (Par. 2, sec. 25, p. 11.)

The prime cause of migration to Canada is the fact that there is much more unoccupied agricultural land there than here. Conditions as to the public domain are more as they were in the United States a quarter of a century or more ago, and men who go there from the United States are taking advantage of high prices they can get for their holdings here to procure cheap lands in Canada. Then, too, the Canadian Government is doing much to induce immigration, and the railroads are cooperating in the granting of very low rates of transportation.

It will be noted from the brief abstract of the Canadian homestead law which I have given that the natural resources, including timber, are reserved from entry or acquisition. As a matter of fact the laws there are more stringent than in the United States, and if our own laws had been modeled after them the scandals that have disgraced our own administration of the public domain could never have occurred.

Our northern neighbors are profiting by our experience and are maintaining forest reserves on as large a scale as is done here. The only relaxation there is to be found in the shorter term of residence required of the homesteader and greater liberality with reference to absences from his entry, and if the Borah homestead bill, which has passed the Senate and House with certain amendments in each body and is now in conference, can be finally agreed upon, it will make our own law conform more nearly in respect to residence to the Canadian law, and will greatly relieve the situation as to the homesteader. I hope that the bill may be agreed upon and enacted into law.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, being somewhat a stranger to the conditions in the West, I should like to ask whether there are in Idaho and other States agricultural lands not in reserves that can be taken up?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There are some, of course, but the best public lands in the West have been taken up, so far as concerns lands for agricultural purposes, and that, as I have suggested, is one of the reasons for the trend of population to Canada.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should not like to have Idaho included in that statement.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will except Idaho at the request of the Senator.

Mr. HEYBURN. There are millions of acres of land in Idaho yet to be taken up under the land laws that are as good as any public land that has ever been thrown open to settlement, and many that would be taken up except that they have been reduced to forest reserves.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Possibly I should qualify my statement to some extent as even applicable to my State in reply to the Senator from Michigan, because there is much land within the exterior limits of irrigation projects that is still subject to entry.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think the Senator from Idaho must have misunderstood me, or I must have misunderstood his answer. I asked if there were any agricultural lands not included in reserves in those States which are fit for agricultural purposes.

Mr. HEYBURN. I understood the question. It was the answer I was answering.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There are still some valuable agricultural lands in the West, but none, in my opinion, at least it is so in my State, such as there were 15 or 20 years ago. The best lands have been taken up except those that are brought under irrigation, and these are as fine lands as can be found anywhere, and there are a great many of those in Idaho as well as in Oregon.

Recurring now to the question of the listing of lands for agricultural purposes within the forest reserves, I have this report from the Forestry Service:

In district 2, whose headquarters is Denver, about 37 per cent of the tracts listed for entry under the forest homestead act have either not been entered at all or have never been settled upon. In New Mexico probably fully 22 per cent of the tracts listed have not been filed upon at all. A considerable portion of the tracts entered have been abandoned, although I have not precise data on this subject in those two States.

In district 4, with headquarters at Ogden, Utah, 33 forests show practically 16 per cent of the listed lands have been abandoned. This does not include the Pocatello National Forest, which shows 40 per cent abandoned.

In California the showing is even worse, where about 43 per cent of the listed tracts have not been settled upon or have been abandoned.

In Oregon and Washington about 27 per cent of the tracts listed for agriculture have been either not filed upon, relinquished, or abandoned.

Even in the State of Idaho, where it is so urgently insisted that there are so many acres of agricultural lands within the reserves, the Forester advises me that though the data secured from the district officers are not yet complete, the indications are that the number of claims either abandoned or not applied for after listing in northern Idaho is approximately 10 per cent and in southern Idaho 16 per cent, giving an average of approximately 13 per cent for the whole State.

This shows that even where listing is done, which the Senator from Idaho insists ought to be done, the land listed for agricultural purposes is either not taken or is taken and abandoned because the settler can not make a living upon it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I can give a reason that was called to my attention by some of them who have abandoned such lands. Men think they can live in solitude and endure it, but when they find they have located a piece of land where there is no possibility of community life they realize after a few months that they are mistaken. It is community life that induces settlement.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think possibly that has something to do with it, but in most cases it is abandoned because they can not make a living on the lands entered.

There is another reason that has not been suggested, for abandonment of these lands or for failure to enter them, and herein I concur in the criticism indulged in by Senators from Idaho. A settler enters a piece of land that is listed for agricultural purposes and stays on it the requisite number of years. Before a patent issues a report has to be made upon it by the inspectors of the Land Department. If the officials of the Land Office are not satisfied with that, they call on the forester for a report from his bureau, and if that is not satisfactory they call for a report from the Geological Survey, to see if there are any water-power privileges on it, and by this species of red-tapism the settler's rights are held in abeyance, and he never knows what the result is likely to be. He has to run the gauntlet of all the departments and this procedure ought to be corrected or abolished, and I am heartily in accord with the Senator from Idaho in criticizing it. That is not the law. If Congress will voice its protest against such methods so that there will be no mistake about what it means, these methods will be abandoned. This bureaucratic system ought to be done away with promptly, and who is going to do it if Congress fails in its duty?

Mr. SMOOT. It is a matter of administration, rather than of law.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There is no question about that.

I have faith that the officers who are undertaking to administer the law will after awhile get all agricultural lands in the reserves listed, so that there will no question about their character.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. NEWLANDS. When the Senator refers to lands that have been listed, what does he mean by that? Lands that have been taken out of the forest reserves?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. For settlement under the homestead forest act.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator does not mean the land has been eliminated from the reserve?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Oh, no.

Mr. BORAH. If they had been eliminated from the reserve everything that we asked would have been done—that is, so far as these particular lands were concerned. It is keeping them within the reserves and doing the things which the Senator has just this moment spoken of, that we complain of.

Speaking for myself, I have never complained of the fact that the timber lands properly are reserved, if they are timber lands, but they have included these agricultural lands. They list them, and then the settler comes along, and he must go through all that process which the Senator from Oregon has just described, and by the time he is through with it, of course he is either bankrupt or discouraged, so that no one else comes into that country to participate with him, and the solitude of the situation drives him away himself finally.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Does the Senator attribute——

The VICE PRESIDENT. One moment. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 18642) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, on request of the Senator from North Carolina, the unfinished business is laid temporarily aside.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator from Oregon, as I understand it, has referred to lands that have been listed, which I understand to be lands included within forest reserves that have been thrown open for settlement under the forest homestead act.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. But he states that as to those lists a comparatively small percentage have been entered. I will ask him whether he attributes that very small percentage to the fact that the land is not really agricultural land, or does he attribute it to the impediments that are thrown in the way of settlement by the various inquiries which have been made by the special agents regarding water-power sites, and so on?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Both. All combine to prevent a man from perfecting his homestead entry, and any kind of useless red tape that hampers him in perfecting his title comes near to making it impossible for him to carry out the purpose and spirit of the law. But the present system of administration, not the policy itself, I am criticizing, makes it so expensive that the settler sometimes abandons the land because he can not pay the expenses necessary to be incurred. He can not hire an attorney to look after his case in the local office, much less in the departments in Washington.

Mr. NEWLANDS. This listing, I understand, is being done by the Forest Service.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is being done under the Forester in conjunction with the Secretary of the Interior.

It is the bureaucratic method of administration that I join in criticizing, not the policy of conservation or the retention of the reserves. I believe that if our people will protest loud enough and long enough we shall get these evils remedied. When lands within the reserves are listed for agricultural purposes, they remain under the jurisdiction of the Forest Service until entered for homestead, and then they are under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator has just anticipated a part of what I had in mind. We use the term "listing lands," but perhaps all will not understand the process of listing lands. I have in mind a settler who found a desirable piece of land. He had his family with him, and he was prepared to live an open-door life for a few months until he could get his land and build the shelter that would be necessary. He applied to have it listed. At the end of 18 months it had not been reported upon whether or not it would be listed. In the meantime he had to drive the team to take his family away, and he never did get that land. The process of listing lands is not a question of overnight. It is a question of months very often.

Then the lists are filed in the land office, which may be 50 or 70 miles distant from the land where the man wants to stay. What is he to do in the meantime? He does not know whether it is going to be listed or reported upon favorably or not. People will not go where they are liable to be subjected to such conditions.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, after the lands are listed they are still under the jurisdiction of the Forest Service. As soon as filed on they come under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior, and are subject to the homestead laws and the regulations governing them.

I think we of the West ought to protest against the adoption of any arbitrary or unjust rules which make it practically impossible for a man to complete his title.

I want to call attention, and ask to have inserted in what I have to say, to the areas in the national forests by States on June 30, 1910, and on June 30, 1911.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection permission is granted.

[1] Due to new computations of acreage.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Now, Mr. President, I come to the eliminations for the year ending June 30, 1911. It has been charged here that the Government officials keep adding to these forest reserves. The eliminations for the past year, including alienated area, were 24,214,693. So there was a diminution of these reserves from 166,103,621 acres, June 30, 1910, to 141,488,928 acres, June 11, 1911. These eliminations have been made as rapidly as the officials have been able to find out what lands ought to be eliminated as unfitted for the Forest Service and as best suited for agricultural purposes.

It is not an easy task for any body of men to do this work hurriedly.

One of the Senators from Idaho, the senior Senator, I believe, spoke of 100,000 people being in the employ of the Forest Service. I am sure he did not mean that.

Mr. HEYBURN. I said directly and indirectly. Yes, I meant that. I was corrected a little later by a Senator who said the number was 112,000.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not think any such exaggerated statement as that will help the cause we are all interested in and about which we want the truth. I do not know how so many persons can be indirectly interested in the subject, but I do know that there are 3,256 men on the pay roll of the Forest Service.

Mr. HEYBURN. Three thousand two hundred?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Three thousand two hundred and fifty-six employees to manage and look after it—nearly 200,000,000 acres of lands in the States, Alaska, and Porto Rico.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator has the wrong figures.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If I am wrong the Forest Service will correct me. I have a statement from the service, and they say that they have 3,256 men. With a less number of men it is a physical impossibility to do this work properly.

Mr. HEYBURN. But the Senator will remember I stated the declaration of the then head forester was that they would have—I think I will not be mistaken about it—more than 100,000 trained men fit for military service as a result of their system.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is probably another of the exaggerated statements of which I spoke awhile ago.

Mr. President, it seems to me that a wrong inference might be drawn by the Senate from the statements which have been made here with reference to the expense of the national forest work. I want to call attention to that for a moment. The items of expenditures and receipts are as follows:

[1] Includes disbursements from February to June 30, 1905; national forests transferred to Department of Agriculture Feb. 1, 1905.
[2] Includes $1,086,590.89 emergency expenditures for fire fighting, etc.

I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that there has been a gradual increase of the receipts from these reserves, bringing them nearer each year to a self-sustaining basis, and I have no doubt, and the Forestry Service has no doubt at all, but that the reserves will be self-sustaining after a while.

Mr. NEWLANDS. May I ask the Senator what is the total amount expended for the Forestry Service?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Does the Senator mean last year or altogether?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes; in the last year.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The expenditures of the Forestry Service last year were $5,919,939.96. This includes, however, $1,086,590.89, emergency expense for fighting the disastrous forest fires of 1910.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will call the Senator's attention to the fact that if there were 100,000 men employed in that service, then the compensation of those men would amount to only $50 a year apiece, which I think demonstrates that the statement is somewhat exaggerated. If they would get about $500 a year each, it would make about $5,000,000 for the number of employees.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In 1903 the total amount expended was $284,752.96 and the amount received was only a little over $45,000. There was a large expenditure and a small amount of receipts. But from that time down to the present the earnings have gradually approached the point where the service will be self-sustaining. In 1911, including over $1,000,000 that was appropriated for fighting fires in 1910, there was $5,919,939.96 expended and there was $2,026,906.15 received, or nearly 50 per cent of the expenses were repaid from receipts of timber sales, grazing, and other sources.

Mr. President, it has also been intimated that the moneys received are reexpended by the department and are to be added to the amounts appropriated by Congress. All the moneys received since 1905 have been paid into the Treasury and can only be used upon reappropriation by Congress like any other funds that are paid into the Treasury.

Now, Mr. President, with reference to the forest fires——

Mr. BORAH. Before the Senator leaves the point which he was discussing, and that is with reference to the fact that the department is becoming self-sustaining, on the face of it, of course, that is most desirable, but when you come to consider the benefits which are to be derived from the forests, and the effect which it has upon the masses of the people, it is not so fascinating, for the reason that the price of timber which they sold in 1891 for $1.98 a thousand board feet, in 1911 they increased to $2.56. So those who have to buy and who get the benefit are really paying the increased price, and what they are making upon these products is paid by the people who purchase them. We may delude ourselves as much as we desire, but we have a very expensive proposition upon our hands, and we have to meet the expenses.

Of course the Senator will understand that in that respect the bureau is not to be criticized, because Congress must declare some policy upon this matter. If the Government is to run the forest reserves upon the basis of securing the highest amount of revenue, it is evident that it is going to cut both ways. We can buy timber cheaper to-day from the timber companies than we can buy it from the Forestry Bureau. Their price in our country for stumpage is higher than the price of individual owners. So we get no relief from that source.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say in reference to that, Mr. President, that the Forestry Service do not fix the price of lumber. They do not manufacture it at all. They only sell the stumpage, and the way they arrive at the value is laid down by the statute itself. They have not any choice. They are directed to sell it at its appraised value in the method pointed out.

Mr. HEYBURN. By whom?

Mr. BORAH. I have said to the Senator that in this particular matter the bureau itself is not subject to criticism, but the system, the policy which is now found to exist by reason of our laws, etc., ought to be modified or changed in some respect, or else we, the people in the West, are going to be up against the proposition of bearing this burden ourselves whether it is appropriated directly from the Treasury or whether we pay an increased price when the product is sold.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Oregon whether it is not advisable, instead of insisting that the stumpage should be sold at the appraised value or insisting upon it that coal should be fixed at a price that will give a profit to the Government, that these resources which are held within the control of the Government should be disposed of at merely nominal prices which are compensatory only of the administration. It seems to me that otherwise the Government itself will simply unite with the great corporations that are controlling the industries both in timber and in coal in keeping up the price.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I could not gather the Senator's full statement. Does the Senator think that we ought to fix the price at which we sell timber the same as the price is fixed by these large companies?

Mr. NEWLANDS. No; I think it should be much less. At all events it seems to me the Government is simply engaged in the business of administering these natural resources in the interest of the people, and each unit that comes from these resources in the shape of so many feet of stumpage or so many tons of coal should be at the very lowest price that will be compensatory to the Government of the cost of administration, and these natural resources should not be administered in such a way as to enable the great corporations to maintain excessive prices.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, if I may be permitted, I was looking for the data. I have not as yet put my hand on it. I had it. There was published recently a statement from reputable authority that there had been a conference between representatives of the Forestry Service and the lumber operators with regard to agreeing upon a scale of prices. I preserved that statement, and I do not think it will be denied. If it should be, I will then hunt up the statement. If the Government is going to enter into a combination in restraint of trade through an agreement with these large lumber interests I do not see how we are to benefit. I shall not rest now until I find that statement, and then I will challenge its verification.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If the Senator will permit me, is it not also true that in many instances—I am asking for more information—that the actual sale of this timber by the Forest Service is to the very lumber companies——

Mr. HEYBURN. That is the stumpage.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I say the timber that they sell at all goes from the reserve to the lumber mill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will answer the Senator from Arizona in a few moments by showing the facts.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I was asking for information.

Mr. TOWNSEND rose.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Does the Senator from Michigan wish to ask a question?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Is it true or not that the settler, the home owner in the region of these forests, is entitled to cut a certain amount of timber for his own benefit? If that is true, ought not the Forest Service to be credited with that?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Forest Service gives an immense amount of lumber, as is shown by the report of the Forester, both to the miner and to the settler.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Is that counted?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; it is counted at its appraised valuation.

Now, with reference to the question of the Senator from Arizona, I ask to have embodied in the RECORD as a part of my remarks the number of timber sales classified according to the amount and value thereof.

The statement referred to is as follows:

Number of timber sales classified according to amount of sale.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It will be noted that nearly 97 per cent of the sales of the past year were under $500 in amount, and that the increase in sales over those during the fiscal year 1910 was almost wholly confined to the smaller transactions.

It will appear from this statement that for the fiscal year 1911 for sales under $100 there were 5,144 contracts entered into; for sales from $100 to $500 there were only 327 contracts entered into; for from $500 to $1,000 there were only 70 contracts; from $1,000 to $5,000, 73 contracts; and over $5,000, 39 contracts. So the Senator will see that in very few instances were any contracts made with large concerns, but they sold to men of small means who probably lived in the vicinity of the particular forest reserve where the sale was made.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That was very gracious, and I was not speaking about those sales. The Senator does not mention the very ones my inquiry goes to. They will sell a few here for fifty and a few there for fifty, and then they sell a million.

In answer to the Senator from Michigan I will say I do not know it is the rule, but I am justified in the assertion by my friend from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] sitting by me, that it does not pertain to either of our States that a man can cut either for mining or domestic purposes upon any one of these forest reserves.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I want to say that in Arizona there were 609 contracts of sale for less than $100 each and only one for over $5,000. It could not be that there were many sales to very large concerns.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. How much was that one? That is the one I am asking about.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I may say that the whole sale in Arizona last year was only $102,880.54.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. There was no necessity of purchasing less. That is what I am still inquiring about. They had about all they needed last year, if I am not misinformed. I am only asking for information.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am giving the figures as they are contained in the report of the Forester.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, there seems to be some ancient history over the views of different Senators as to the price at which the timber should be sold. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] says that the timber is appraised and its value fixed in that way. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] says it is being sold for a higher price than the private corporations are selling it. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] says it ought to be sold for a less price. Now, I should like to know of the Senator from Oregon how the basis of the valuation should be arrived at in determining the price at which the timber should be sold.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will tell you how the department arrived at the basis of valuation.

Mr. WORKS. That is not my question, if the Senator will allow me. I was asking for his opinion as to what would be a proper basis for fixing the price.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. For the stumpage I would take as a basis the selling price of the manufactured lumber and deduct from it the cost of manufacture and a reasonable profit. That ought to give the fair stumpage value, and that is the way the value is arrived at now. There is no other way to get at it. Sometimes it may be a little higher than the stumpage value fixed by others, but I do not think that makes any difference. The Government ought not to be, and is not, in the lumber business. The sale of timber is merely for the disposition of fallen and ripe timber, to keep the forests safe against fire and in such condition that they will grow in the future.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I hope the Senator will not interrupt me, for while I do not decline to be interrupted I find I am detaining the Senate much longer than I intended to, and for that reason I am anxious to get through. I desire to have put in the RECORD, Mr. President, the amount of receipts and disbursements from the reserves for the fiscal years 1910 and 1911, to show just what has been realized and what has been expended in this behalf.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Now, Mr. President, adverting again to the general policy of conservation, having referred at length to the conditions and causes which aroused the people to its necessity, I want to say to our southern friends that they are just as much interested in this as we are because in the final analysis—I do not care what anybody says to the contrary—if the timber areas at the upper stretches of the Mississippi River and its tributaries are denuded the same disastrous floods which are now devastating the Mississippi Valley may be expected every year.

I know that some very distinguished gentlemen here and elsewhere are insisting that it does not make any difference whether these areas are deforested or not; that there will be no greater downflow of waters from the upper stretches of the streams without timber than there is with timber. Every ordinary citizen knows better than that, because if the land is denuded and soil erosion takes place, as is bound to occur, leaving barren rocks where once there was a verdant forest, the melting snows, in conjunction with the rains and storms, must of necessity pour down with greater rapidity and with greater disaster than where the snows and waters are held back by the forest and the undergrowth, which act like sponges for their retention.

Mr. HEYBURN. The trouble is that it does not. The snow goes off in the timber before it does in the equivalent upon land. If the Senator will raise the curtains in his office and look out over the Oregon mountains he will verify it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Idaho is sui generis. That may be the case in Idaho, but it is different in Oregon and elsewhere.

Mr. HEYBURN. When this question was under discussion four years ago, I guess it was, I had occasion to go from Portland down to California with the Oregon mountains within plain sight on either side of the railroad, and I verified the conditions that existed in Idaho as to Oregon. I saw the snow lying on the bare mountain tops and ridges, but the timber had no snow in it. Why not? The snow in the timber is impeded in its fall by limbs of trees and it lies lightly upon the ground. The rain percolates from the trees upon it. Then the Chinook winds come along in Oregon and in Idaho. I have seen 3 feet of snow disappear in 12 hours by the Chinook wind after it was thus subjected to the falling rain through the tree tops.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator was looking at Mount Hood, I am sure, when he went through Oregon, and there the snow stays all the year round because of the great altitude.

Mr. HEYBURN. Oregon has a great many mountains besides Hood. Mount Hood is a good mountain.

Mr. GALLINGER. We do not have Chinook winds in New Hampshire, but I know that the snow remains in the forests of New Hampshire much longer than it does on the cleared lands—weeks and months sometimes. So I think the Senator's contention is right.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think so, too.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Idaho must be speaking of a peculiar condition of atmosphere. It may be due to the Chinook winds. We know nothing about those winds in our part of the country.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That has been my experience. I have been over the mountains in my State frequently. We go up to a certain altitude where there is both forest and barren lands. The snow remains in that forest while 100 yards or 500 yards away there are barren places and the snow has melted; it has all gone down into valleys and streams below. There is no question about that, and I think that has been the experience of most of those who live in mountainous countries.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Can the Senator tell me whether during his investigation he has found what effect denuding the land of timber has on rainfall? I can say that I believe largely what the Senator has been saying; but I have been wondering whether or not, by denuding these lands, we would have the floods the Senator complains of because of cutting the timber, or if the rainfall might be lessened.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, there is a difference of opinion about that, as there is about all of these questions; but the hard-headed American citizen wants to get down to things as he sees them, as his every-day experience tells him they are in fact.

Mr. President, not only is the South interested in the preservation of the forests at the upper stretches of the Mississippi, in order to store the rainfall and melting snows, but they are further interested in it, with their great levee systems, in seeing to it that everything shall be done at these upper stretches to prevent the erosion of the soil and its washing down the streams. The contention of some is that in these denuded districts on the upper stretches of the Mississippi River and its tributaries, the soil has washed down so rapidly that it is actually making the levee system impracticable; in other words, the beds of the streams are filling up from the erosion of the soil on the upper stretches. It is common sense that that is true, too. If the waters come down rapidly—and they came down this year from all the streams at the same time—and there is nothing to retard them in their progress toward the sea, they are bound to take a great deal of soil and bound to fill up the streams, so that the Government is spending millions of dollars every year to protect rivers within their banks, and at the same time permitting the forests to be denuded at the headwaters, where they ought to be protected.

There is another subject to which I wish to call attention. The Senator from Idaho stated that all of these fires originated within the reserves. I know the Senator wants to be fair. These statements of his, he promises, are going over the heads of the newspaper men, and they are going to reach the people of the whole country anyway. While he is sending them out he ought to see to it that they are reasonably correct.

Take the disastrous fires of 1910. The total area burned over was 4,134,253 acres. The loss entailed was 6,508,369,000 board feet, valued at $14,889,724. The total number of fires was 5,201, of which 1,704, or 32.76 per cent, were caused by railroad locomotives; 724, or 13.62 per cent, by lightning; 668, or 13.23 per cent, by campers; and the balance were caused by brush burning, sawmills and donkey engines, miscellaneous sources, incendiarism, and unknown. In the same year Idaho had 526 fires in the national forests; 64 of these were on private lands inside of the forests; 154 originated outside the forest boundaries; 189 from locomotives of railroads; 162 from lightning; 16 from incendiarism; 90 from campers; 76 from brush burning; 7 from sawmills; 161 unknown; miscellaneous, 43; making a total of 744 fires. So it is not true that these young men with their green uniforms and cockade hats started these fires in the national forests as is charged by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN].

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I dislike to interrupt the Senator——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. But I am advised, on coming into the Chamber, that the statement I made yesterday with reference to no fires originating in the settlements is being challenged. I merely want to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that I was then speaking from very accurate and close observation of Idaho, and not of any other State.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I, too, was speaking of Idaho, and from the record.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is all right. Now I will listen to the Senator.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have finished; but this report simply shows that the fires originated in other places than within the reserves.

Complaint is made about the immense expenditure for permanent improvements within the forests. The improvements that have been made are necessary for the protection of the forests, such as roads, paths, trails, telephone lines, fire lines, and bridges, in order to make all ranges and other stations easily accessible to each other and so that information, men, and material can be conveyed from one place to another with the greatest rapidity.

Mr. President, aside from the immense financial loss from fires in 1910, 78 lives were sacrificed in fighting those fires. I venture to say that if it had not been for the Forestry Service the fires would have been immensely more destructive than they were. Idaho alone lost $13,392,173. Other of the States lost singly almost as much, and all of them lost a great deal.

They now have in the national forests only 1,325 miles of road, 9,163 miles of trail, 7,380 miles of telephone lines, and about 350 miles of special fire lines. To properly patrol and care for this immense wealth of the National Government, they ought to have 80,000 miles of new trails and 45,000 miles of telephone lines, so as to put the different forests in close touch with each other and keep the whole department advised as to what is going on. The time is coming when this will be done—when it will be essential to be done—in order to protect the property of the Government, just as the individual would protect his own property against loss by fire. A wise public policy demands the annual expenditure of larger sums than are now being appropriated to protect the vast timber wealth of the country from destruction by fire.

To show that the people of this country are interested in the subject of protection, I call attention to the fact, Mr. President, that many of the Western States are cooperating with the Federal Government in the protection of the forests. Oregon is doing it. Not only is the legislature appropriating money for the assistance of the State commission, but private owners as well are contributing of their means and cooperating with the Government and the State for the purpose of fighting and controlling the fires.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, one of the most disastrous of the fires that occurred during the last year was in my State. I want, in this connection, to bear witness to the promptness and efficiency with which the Forest Service responded to the call for help under the circumstances.

I would like to say also, in connection with what the Senator from Oregon has just stated, that the State of California is aiding in the effort to provide means to prevent and control these fires. Our people regard it as of the greatest consequence to them and to their property that such appropriation shall be made. Not only is the State contributing in that way, but private owners also are contributing their money. The fruit associations levy regular assessments upon their members for the purpose of raising money and creating a fund for fighting fires and preserving their property in that way in connection with the National Government.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I am glad to know that California is doing so, and the time is coming when all of the Western States will be driven to do so, and private timber owners as well.

The entire cost of the administration and protection of the national forests averages only 2½ cents per annum per acre, and that includes all expenses. In France such administration costs $1; in British India 7 cents, while in Prussia it costs $2.50 per acre per annum, and when there is deducted from the gross expense for maintaining the Forest Service the amount earned therefrom it only costs 1½ cents instead of 2½ cents per acre.

I have answered some of the strictures against the service and would like to have answered others, but I feel that I have already imposed on the Senate too long.

I want to say, in conclusion, that I have approved of the policy of the Government in maintaining these national reserves. I am not prepared to say to what changes I would assent, provided the Senators from the West would get together and frame a uniform code of laws for the management and disposition of the public domain. But while conditions remain as they are, while the timber and stone act remains in force, while these indemnity selection acts to which I have referred remain on the statute books, I shall vote now and at all times for the maintenance in their integrity of every forest reserve in the State of Oregon.

I want to say to the Senator from Idaho, although a vast portion of that magnificent Commonwealth is within the reserves—nearly one-fourth of ours is within the reserves—I would rather have that land held in the reserves, Mr. President, and not pay a dollar taxes to the State of Oregon for 40 years, than to have it get into the hands of speculators and under monopolistic control, for such control not only will mean the disposition of the timber, but the denudation of the forests absolutely, and it will mean the acquirement of the water powers and the water privileges of the States, besides the wealth of mineral of all kinds that lies buried beneath our mountains.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Speaking for myself alone, of course, as in part representing the State of Idaho, I agree perfectly with the statement of the Senator from Oregon. I think the forest reserves ought to have been created and ought to be continued until some policy is adopted by which the benefit can be transmitted to the people individually, if that can ever be done, and, I wish to say, in order that there may be no mistake about any criticism which I have made upon the Forest Service, that I do not desire the forest reserves to be abandoned; but I want, to begin with, that nothing but forests be included in the reserves. When that has been accomplished, so far as I represent the State of Idaho, I shall be glad to stand with the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am satisfied that if the Senator from Idaho and I were all the persons to be consulted in this matter we could retire to our offices and in a very short while frame a law that would suit the people of our States; but there are other and conflicting interests that interfere with the proper adjustment of this matter. Here as in every case whenever you undertake to settle a matter for the benefit of the masses of the people, there are some special interests that intervene and interfere all the time with a proper adjustment of it, and, try as we may, Mr. President, to enact proper legislation, we will always find that there is some powerful interested source interfering and clogging the wheels of proper and appropriate legislation.

Mr. FALL and Mr. SMITH of Arizona addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. To whom does the Senator from Oregon yield?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico first.

Mr. FALL. As I have been heard upon this subject before, and as the Senator is now referring to the interests which are always interfering, I want to say that we have some interests in New Mexico and in Arizona which do desire to be heard here, and which are interfering in so far as I am able to voice those interests.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I hope the Senator will not think that I referred to any Senator in anything I have said.

Mr. FALL. Well, I did not understand what the Senator referred to, but I simply refer to his words. I desire, however, to cite one instance, Mr. President. I happen to remember that five years ago one mining company with which I happened to be connected, or in which I was interested slightly, just over the line from Arizona, paid to Oregon $641,000 for timber which was put in that one mine alone. That amount was paid for Oregon pine, carried down the coast, and shipped 1,000 miles overland by railroad, when the forests of Arizona and New Mexico lay within 60 or 100 miles. We could not, however, get timber for the mine from our own country and paid Oregon a toll of $641,000 in one year for timber going into that one mine.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am very glad that Oregon was able to help you.

Mr. FALL. So am I; but if you had put all your forests in Oregon in forest reserves, where would we have gotten any assistance?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I wanted to say to the Senator when I rose to my feet that I concur fully with the policy suggested by the Senator from Idaho. There is no purpose, so far as I know, on the part of the western people to have their mountains denuded of timber growth—and with us it grows nowhere else except on the mountains, and in our section conditions are different from conditions in other parts of the country—but the point I wish to make is that whenever you eliminate the scrip proposition, under which the denuded railroad lands have been traded for fine timber lands, and an entry of lands under the present land laws is alone possible, does the Senator suggest, or can the ingenuity of anybody suggest, that the law properly enforced would permit vast acquisition of the timberlands of the country?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is exactly what I say, Mr. President. If all the western Senators, or all Senators, so far as that is concerned, will get together and frame a reasonable and just code of laws for the disposition of the public domain, I am not prepared to say how far I might be willing to go toward making eliminations from the reserves; but, with the laws as they are, with these indemnity selection privileges given to great companies and corporations, with the stone and timber act remaining in its full integrity, and other laws by which title may be easily acquired, I shall oppose constantly the releasing of any of the lands within the Federal reserves, because I know what has happened in my State in the past and I know what would happen in the future. I know that immense bodies of land are now held by individuals and corporations; I know that the Weyerhausers and others have immense holdings in my State, which just as effectually retard the development of the State as do the lands held within the forest reserves. I am opposed to having that condition extended in my State at least, and will therefore be compelled to stand against any change in reference to the other States.

Instead of denouncing and criticizing the Forestry Bureau officials and undertaking to defeat a proper appropriation, as has been attempted to be done in the Senate, Mr. President, I think that the American people ought to take their hats off to the men who have inaugurated this movement; they ought to take their hats off to Mr. Graves, the present Forester, who is here devoting the best energies of his life to the protection of the great interests of the public; they ought to take their hats off to the young men in all the States of the West who are risking their lives and doing all in their power to protect the public domain not only for the interest of those living, but for the interest of those who are coming after us.

Mr. President, differing from the administration in politics, as I do, I am yet willing to stand here and give them my support in every way possible, to defend them against unjust charges, to assist them to do their duty in the future as they have done it in the past; and I predict that the time is not far distant when the American people, with one accord, will extend to these men their appreciation of the efforts which they have made to protect the national resources of this country from the looting of monopolistic interests.

Mr. BURNHAM. Mr. President, I do not propose to occupy at any considerable length the time of the Senate. I can bring to this discussion no personal knowledge. Such knowledge as I have of the subject comes from reading and from information from the department.

It seems to me that there is a very wide difference of opinion here as to the conditions in the forests with reference to agriculture. The Secretary of Agriculture, through the Forest Service, represented to the committee that in the main the forests cover mountainous regions that are not adapted to agricultural purposes. That statement is before us in the form of a memorandum from the Chief of the Forest Service. A part of that statement reads as follows:

> The national forests are situated in the mountains, and on account of the rugged topography there are no large bodies of agricultural land left in the forests. There are, however, occasional small patches of land along the borders and at the confluence of streams and on occasional benches where the soil is deep enough for cultivation. The forest homestead act of June 11, 1906, had for its purpose to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to select those areas in the forests which are suitable for cultivation and to list them with the Secretary of the Interior for entry to settlers. The Forest Service has consistently encouraged the settlement of areas in the national forests suited for agriculture and already has listed for settlement over 1,000,000 acres for over 8,000 settlers.

I call attention to this fact as a refutation of the statement that the Forest Service is in any sense hostile to the interests of agriculture. Then the statement continues:

> This is in addition to the many eliminations made within the last two or three years, aggregating over 9,000,000 acres of lands which were found to be not suited for forest growth or more valuable for agriculture.

I wish now to read a further statement, because I want to be exact as to the causes for the rejection of applications for tracts under the homestead act:

> The charge is repeatedly made that when prospective settlers apply for the listing of tracts for agriculture, the Forest Service is reluctant to open them for settlement. This is not in accordance with the facts. It is true that the Forest Service has rejected a great many applications for tracts under the homestead act. The reasons for the rejections are that the lands applied for were not chiefly valuable for agriculture. In a great many instances applications have been made for lands having upon them a very heavy stand of timber, often from 10,000 to 50,000 feet per acre of timber, worth from $2 to $5 per thousand feet on the stump. It was not the purpose of Congress to permit the acquirement of a valuable timber stake under the guise of this law. The listing of lands with heavy stand of timber upon them is contrary to law, because they are more valuable for their timber and timber production than for agriculture. Furthermore, experience has shown that the listing of lands containing a valuable stand of timber does not result in actual homestead settlement, as in the majority of such cases the lands are sold for their timber value instead of being cleared and put under cultivation.

It seems that applications are made for other purposes, the real purpose being very different from that of a homestead. The statement continues:

> Applications are also made for other purposes than agriculture. Thus sometimes an applicant desires to get control of a water hole which controls the adjoining range over many thousands of acres. The Forest Service has declined to list such lands, but has insisted upon retaining them in public ownership for the benefit of the people.

Other special purposes are cited. Here is a matter to which allusion has been made by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], namely, the large percentage of those who have made application and afterwards abandoned their selections. It shows the liberality of the Forest Service. Not only have they listed the lands that were desirable, so desirable that they were occupied, but they have listed a large number of those which were abandoned:

> In district 2, whose headquarters is at Denver, about 37 per cent of the tracts listed for entry under the forest homestead act have either not been entered at all or have never been settled upon or have been abandoned. In New Mexico probably fully 22 per cent of the tracts listed have not been filed upon at all. A considerable portion of the tracts entered have been abandoned, although I have not precise data on this subject in this State.
> In district 4, with headquarters at Ogden, Utah, 33 forests show practically 16 per cent of the listed lands have been abandoned. This does not include the Pocatello National Forest, which shows 40 per cent abandoned.

I think the Pocatello Forest is an Idaho forest, and there 40 per cent of the selections have been abandoned.

> In California the showing is even worse, where about 43 per cent of the listed tracts have not been settled upon or have been abandoned.

It seems to me that this shows that the Forest Service has been fair and liberal in its listing of lands for settlement for agricultural purposes. It has denied to those who are seeking lands for other purposes the listing and location of lands not chiefly valuable for agriculture.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. BURNHAM. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Of course, the Senator understands that when the Forester states that 22 per cent or 30 per cent of the former forest area has been listed as agricultural land and that only a small proportion of that area has been taken up that fact would be valuable only when it was ascertained when the lands were released from the forest reserves. Very likely that includes lands within national forests in my State, which in the last month have been released as agricultural lands. Of course, as yet, there has been no opportunity whatever to take up those lands.

If the Senator would give us a statement of the lands that, say, two years or three years ago were released, and then give an estimate of the percentage of those that have been taken, it would be more to the point, I should think. Of course, lands listed as agricultural lands and released from the Forest Service to-day can not be taken up to-morrow; neither could they be taken up next week or next year.

Mr. BURNHAM. But quite a percentage of these lands evidently have been abandoned after they had been taken possession of and occupied for more or less time.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes; that is true. I myself can not see, under present conditions and circumstances, why anybody would want a home within a forest reserve; but still, some people do.

Mr. BURNHAM. They desire to go there; they know the conditions and go there with their eyes wide open.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Exactly so; and the Senator and I very often have taken steps that we thought would be desirable, which have not proved to be so. The mere abandonment of land does not mean that it is not necessarily good agricultural land, and that after its abandonment by one man it will not be taken up by another. In northwestern Iowa, one of the most fertile portions of the entire country where the homestead law applied, I remember, when I was a young man, that whole counties were abandoned by homesteaders, and the people moved away from there. The final entry upon the homestead is not by any means necessarily made by the man who makes the original entry. The abandonment of homesteads is not unknown, and the abandonment of a homestead is not evidence, by any means, that the land is not suitable for cultivation.

Mr. BURNHAM. It would certainly seem to a person, outside from information such as I have laid before the Senate, that the lands abandoned could not be desirable for agricultural purposes and were therefore abandoned. The entryman went there for the purpose of settling down on a homestead; he knew the country; he knew there was no community life there; he went there with his eyes open, as I have said, and he abandoned it. I can conceive of no other reason for the abandonment.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. There might be the very reason the Senator cites there given by the Forester. For instance, a man may have found a supply of water where he thought he could make a home, but he leaves because he finds he can not get the water. The water has been taken away from the settler, because in the estimates of the United States Forestry Service he moved there to corral the water.

Mr. BURNHAM. It occurred to me that the locator was trying to get the water supply in order to control the use of the range.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. There can not be any profit from a monopoly of the water supply where individual parties are so far apart.

Mr. BURNHAM. But take it in the arid regions, where water is very valuable, might it not be very necessary for the use of the range?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. They are not in forest reserves, because arid lands are not included in forest reserves, because on them there is no timber.

Mr. BURNHAM. Well, in a country more or less arid there are some forests.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Of course. The fact is that we can not reason out this matter. We can not come to any sane conclusion from a discussion of it. We can not say that a certain piece of land which has been abandoned is not fit for a home, because, I imagine, many good homes have been made in New Hampshire upon land which perhaps at this time new settlers would not take. It is timberland; it is land upon the mountain sides; and I will hazard the statement that lands and farms in New Hampshire which 12 years ago were regarded as worthless are now coming into cultivation, or will again come into cultivation as the necessities of man may demand.

The mere fact that a man has abandoned a piece of land, thinking it not worth while to go on and make a home, under all the disadvantages that he had at that particular time, is no reason why a year or two from now, when conditions change, that land will not be a very desirable piece of land.

Mr. BURNHAM. That was the condition a few years ago, but of late years there has been a disposition to return to those homes, and they are occupied and very much improved.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Exactly; and hence the Senator would not believe, because men abandoned those homes 20 years ago, that they were not fit for cultivation and he would not put them in a forest reserve. The man who goes on a piece of land after 20 years of abandonment finds that the man before him made a mistake, and he will go ahead.

Mr. BURNHAM. There has to be considered the drift toward villages and cities, and this accounts for a large part of the abandonment of those farms.

There are certain facts as to the area of these reserves which I wish to lay before the Senate, and perhaps more definitely than has before been presented.

These reserves are not wholly in the continental part of the United States. Two of these large forest reserves are in Alaska and one in Porto Rico. The whole area embraces 187,752,503 acres. Taking out the Alaska and Porto Rico areas, there are 160,937,703 acres. These forests are distributed over 20 States.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I will say that I could take nearly 20 other States of the Union and distribute these forests over them, and there would not be left a place in those 20 States on which to build a schoolhouse.

The Senator says that these forests, containing 160,000,000 acres, are distributed over 20 States. It means a belt about 200 miles wide from Chicago to New York. I can take those 160,000,000 acres—and I will say here a great deal of our rich lands in the Mississippi Valley have been flooded—and it will take a strip of land 150 or 175 miles wide from the Gulf way up beyond the city of St. Louis. It does not do any good to belittle the amount of land in these forest reserves.

Mr. BURNHAM. I am speaking of this to give an idea of the amount of land involved.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That is the reason I spoke—to give the comparative amount.

Mr. BURNHAM. Another matter that has been spoken of is in reference to the number of persons engaged in the Forestry Service. I think the Senator from Oregon correctly stated the number. It is 3,256. A question has been raised as to the locality from which these men are selected, and right here I want to read from a statement I have in order that we may be exact. The Forester says:

> The forest rangers are all recruited from local civil-service registers. Practical examinations are given in each national-forest State.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Will the Senator please read that again?

Mr. BURNHAM. Certainly.

> The forest rangers are all recruited from local civil-service registers. Practical examinations are given in each national-forest State. In making appointments from a given local register the residents of the State are given preference. The charge that eastern men are brought on to fill ranger positions in Western States is therefore not true.
> The higher positions, such as supervisor and deputy supervisor, are filled by promotion. In case of vacancies men are selected who are thoroughly familiar with local conditions, and the best man is picked, regardless of whether he is a forest ranger or forest assistant or occupies some other position.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. As I interjected a sentence or two in the previous debate upon this particular point, I want to say that I believe recently an improvement has been made in this matter. I will say this, however, that notwithstanding the statement now made by the Forester, it is not a fact that the majority of the rangers in those States are local men, and I will explain why they are not.

Formerly there was no attention whatever paid to local appointments. The consequence was that while perhaps the examinations might be held in the forest States the candidates were not always residents of those States. The consequence was that where forest rangers were needed and where there was no eligible list the examination would not be held, but the appointees would be taken from eligible lists from some other part of the country. The consequence is that now few vacancies occur. Those few may perhaps now be filled from among the local people. I make that explanation so that the Senator can see that our former statement in the matter and the present statement of the Forester are not at all inconsistent.

The Forester does not refer to the time when these reservations were first organized and manned. He refers to the vacancies that now occur or where additional foresters or rangers are now required.

Mr. BURNHAM. Is not all being done that can now be done to give preference to the local people for the position of ranger?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am not prepared to say that that is not true at this time, but the unfortunate condition exists that there are no places to give the local people unless a man dies or resigns.

Mr. BURNHAM. There certainly must be many changes in a service of that number.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. BURNHAM. Certainly.

Mr. FALL. Of course the Senator understands that the forest ranger has nothing to do with the administration of the reserve. Each reserve is in charge of a forester or deputy forester or supervisor. The rangers are the men who simply travel around the district or otherwise on the range and act under the orders of the supervisor or deputy supervisor.

I agree with the Senator and with that statement, in so far as the majority of the deputy forest rangers are concerned, but there are forest rangers and deputy forest rangers, and then there is a district supervisor of forestry for certain forest reserves.

But the ranger has nothing to do with administration. He obeys orders and looks after the grazing upon the forest reserves, or he fights fire in a case where such work is necessary, but he has nothing to do with the administration.

Our people do not complain of the rangers or their methods of doing their business or performing their duties, but the complaint is that instead of taking forestry supervisors or deputy forestry supervisors from the locality, they are taken generally from Washington City, from clerical positions in the department here and not from the locality at all. We have 10 forest reserves in New Mexico, and I think I know all the foresters in charge of them, and not one of those men is from New Mexico, to my knowledge. They are the men who administer the forest laws. We do not complain of the rangers themselves, but the rangers themselves, I can say to the Senator, complain of the forester and those under whom they work. They are not permitted to do the work that falls to them as they would do it if they had more discretion.

Mr. BURNHAM. The statement is here made:

> In case of vacancies men are selected who are thoroughly familiar with local conditions, and the best man is picked, regardless of whether he is a forest ranger or forest assistant, or occupies some other position.

And the idea stated here is that these places above that of ranger are filled as the result of promotion; that is, the ranger who becomes efficient, having occupied the position for some length of time, becomes available for promotion.

Mr. FALL. If there has been a promotion from a forest ranger to forest supervisor in New Mexico, I have never heard of it.

Mr. BURNHAM. That may be peculiar to New Mexico. This, of course, is a general statement.

I understand that the Forest Service has six districts and six district foresters. The whole Forest Service is divided into six districts and under the six district foresters are the supervisors, and under the supervisors, of course, come the employees and rangers.

Now, considerable has been said in regard to the disposition of the Forestry Service toward agriculture. I can not understand why the Forestry Service should be in any sense hostile to the agricultural service. It is a part of that service, and it seems very strange that the Forester should act in any way inconsistent with the interests of the homesteader. If any rules and regulations are at fault, undoubtedly they would be corrected as soon as attention is called to them.

There is another matter that is important, and I wish to call attention to it, because I have some definite information in regard to it, and that is with reference to the expenditures of this department.

The total expenditures of the Forest Service during the last 10 years—July 1, 1901, to June 30, 1911—were $22,440,972.59.

This amount was stated in the debate on the first day of the consideration of the bill as the expense of the service during a single year. Instead of that, it is not more than a quarter of that amount for any one year.

Of this there was spent before the transfer of the forests from the Department of the Interior $816,333.21, and since the transfer, in general investigations in forestry, $1,204,104.38, making a total for investigative work of $3,020,437.59.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate to items of expenditures and receipts.

It leaves as the cost of national-forest administration, protection, and improvement during those 10 years		$19,420,435.00
Against these gross expenditures should be credited the following assets:
Receipts from the national forests	$10,307,868.45
Permanent improvements and nonexpendable property inventoried (H. Doc. 681, 62d Cong., 2d sess., pp. 19–36)	2,501,043.03
Permanent improvements and nonexpendable property added in 1911 (estimated)	400,000.00
Expendable property, stock on hand (estimated)	100,000.00
		13,308,911.48
Which leaves as the net outlay on account of the forests for the 7 years since the Forest Service took charge of them		6,111,523.52
Or an annual net cost per year of		873,074.79

Now, if the Senate will listen—I know it is tedious to read these figures, but I should like to have your attention for a moment—I have here a comparison of expenditures for the year 1910–11 with the year 1911–12: Salaries, 1911–12, $2,318,680; general expenses, $3,214,420; making the total of expenses for that year $5,533,100.

Now, in this bill the salaries proposed are $2,235,760; general expenses, $3,223,285—a total of $5,459,045.

The decrease in the salaries under the bill as proposed is $82,920; the increase in general expenses is $8,865, making a net decrease of $74,055.

Now, there are just a few figures more which I want to give; that is, the figures as to the receipts from timber sales.

The receipts from timber sales for the year ending June 30, 1911, were $1,014,769.84; grazing, $935,490.38; and for various special uses, miscellaneous, $76,645.93, making a total of $2,026,906.15. Deducting the receipts from the expenditures leaves a net balance of $3,506,193.85.

I had intended to occupy a little more time in the further discussion of this matter from the standpoint I have taken—the views of the department—but the hour is getting late. I simply want to add a word. We think that this bill, as it has come from the committee, after critical examination by the subcommittee and the committee itself, should meet with the approval of the Senate. It comes here in the interest of agriculture, in the interest of a great department of government, which it seems to me has served this country as faithfully as any department could. It comes from the Secretary of Agriculture, practically all from his estimates, and I submit there is no man living in this country to-day who has done more in a material sense for the interests of this country than the Secretary of Agriculture.

The bill comes here, so far as the Forest Service is concerned, with the approval of the Chief of the Forest Service, Mr. Henry S. Graves, alluded to by the Senator from Oregon as devoting his life to this great work. Graduated from Yale, he entered upon the study of forestry. He then went to Europe, England, France, and Germany, and studied especially the English policy of forestry in British India. He devoted a great deal of time here in the Forest Service before he came into that service as chief. He is admirably equipped for the duties of that office, and I submit that he is not here in any sense hostile to the interests of agriculture and the homeseeker. So far as the forestry part of the bill is concerned, we think it certainly should receive the approval of the Senate. The bill as a whole is submitted in the belief that it will be found reasonable in the amount of its appropriations, and that these amounts will sustain this great department in its labors for the agricultural interests of the whole country.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I intend to detain the Senate but a few moments, although much could be said on this most important question. I myself have been deeply interested in the question of forestry, and have studied it not only as applied to the United States, but I have been abroad, in England and in Germany particularly, and have visited the great forests of those countries. I have studied the administration of forests in foreign lands and in our country, and as far as the principle of forestry is concerned and the results obtained from it, I think it is of great interest to our country, and one of the policies adopted by our Government that will ultimately prove of greater benefit to the people at large than almost any of the other great questions which have been acted upon by Congress in the last 10 or 20 years.

The trouble in the past has been that every criticism that has been directed against the land laws of the United States has been in connection with and at a time when the discussion of the forestry policy was under consideration, and the Forest Service has been charged up with all the shortcomings of the land laws.

Most of the Senators, as we have heard them express themselves, are in favor of protection of our forests. The trouble is that within the forest reserves there have been included lands that are not timber lands, and if a proper classification of the lands now in the reserve can be made and a proper elimination from these forest reserves of all agricultural lands, I do not believe there will be very much opposition in the future to the great policy of preserving our timber lands within forest reserves.

Mr. President, I know that a policy of classifying the lands within the forest reserves is being considered, and I believe will be adopted by the Secretary of Agriculture in the immediate future.

I have a copy of a letter of April 11, 1912, addressed to the Secretary of Agriculture, signed by H. S. Graves, Forester, and I want to read the letter to show that this classification of lands is now under consideration, and that there is no doubt in the world that it will be followed out as a policy for the future. Mr. Graves in his letter says:

APRIL 11, 1912.

The SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE.

SIR: It appears exceedingly desirable to undertake as rapidly as practicable the systematic classification of national-forest lands which are chiefly valuable for agriculture. Under the act of June 11, 1906, lands alleged to be valuable for farming are examined, as a rule, only upon specific application from persons desiring to enter them. This method is extremely expensive. Under it, with individual tracts examined from time to time over long periods, it is extremely difficult to make the classification systematic and uniform. Great economy would be effected and a more systematic and rational utilization of the agricultural lands still remaining in the national forests secured if this work could be placed upon the basis of systematic classifications on the various forests as rapidly as it is found practicable to undertake them. The approval by you of the classification of agricultural lands within each national forest which is examined would definitely fix the character of the land so classified in the same manner as the character of mineral lands is now fixed by classification made by the Geological Survey. The approved classification would furnish the basis for listing any lands in the forests concerned for agricultural entry as they might be applied for. This plan would go far toward eliminating the criticism now made of the policy followed by the department as to agricultural areas within the national forests.

If it meets with your approval, I shall be glad to begin the classification of agricultural lands within the national forests this season and carry it forward as rapidly as available funds will permit.

Very respectfully,

H. S. GRAVES, Forester.

Approved.

JAMES WILSON, Secretary.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am glad the Forester is to begin the classification of these lands, for the Senator will readily see that even at the best the Forester could not succeed in the final classification of these lands for many, many years. When you consider the area, over 160,000,000 acres of land, as stated by the Senator from New Hampshire, you can imagine how long it will take to select from that area those lands that are useful for agriculture and those that are not. I will undertake to say that not in 50 years could it be done. The Senator knows how long it took to classify the mineral lands along the Northern Pacific land grant.

The whole forestry system was developed as a hothouse product, when it ought to have had a steady, healthy growth. When these forest reserves were created they were created without any knowledge on the part of the President or the Secretary of the Interior or anybody else as to whether they were forest lands or not.

They reached out and took in great stretches of country without knowing whether there was any timber on it or not, and the complaint now is that this land is still locked up under the original proclamation and that they let go a piece of it now and then, until finally they eliminate the agricultural lands, whereas as a matter of fact the right way to reach the situation is to rescind the proclamation heretofore made and then ascertain the exact boundaries of the areas to be put in forest reserves and put them in reserves.

The Senator very well knows that the reserves first created were created from a map in the Land Office—taking a map and running around six or seven or eight or nine hundred thousand acres at the head of streams, as they appeared on the map, thinking that the forests would naturally be there, whereas it was stated by those who had been over the land that there was not enough timber on those lands to justify their cutting.

The Senator very well knows that the very last large addition that was made to forest lands was made by a proclamation of the President before the Land Office had time to enumerate the sections and townships that were to be put in the reserve, and that it was made absolutely without survey and information. Now, that is what we complain of. As I said, the pyramid is sitting on the top. What ought to be done is to secure accurate information before the forest reserve is created. Then there will be no necessity of this waiting year after year and year after year. As the Senator well said, no one objects to a proper forest reservation in this country, but not that you can lock up a whole vast area of country under the pretense that it is forest land and should be conserved as forest land, and then dribble out the little tracts of agricultural lands when men want them. The system ought to be revised.

I think if we have a Forest Service we ought to support it. I am not making any contention against the appropriations in this bill. I simply want to put on record the protest of certain Members of the Senate that the system is wrong, and it ought to be changed from the root up. This discussion will go on every year upon this bill. We are appropriating every year for the Forestry Service one-third or more of the whole volume of money that we appropriate for the great Agricultural Department. We do not think it is right, and we are going to continue to protest against it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the 160,000,000 acres that are included within the boundaries of the forest reserves proper in the United States were all the lands, such as mineral lands, agricultural lands, salt lands, grazing lands, oil lands, and coal lands, then the statement of the Senator would be correct, and I would myself believe it would take perhaps 50 years to classify them. But the Senator must remember that the great part of the lands within the forest reserves are mountainous lands, and it does not take any time to classify them as not being agricultural lands.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Oh, Mr. President, I shall have to differ with the Senator, although he lives in a mountainous country, and so do I. I know very fine farms on the borders of his State and on the borders of mine, 7,000 feet above sea level.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there is no doubt about that; and there is nobody who can not classify a little piece of farm land in some little valley between two hills in the mountains as agricultural land. That is not going to take any great length of time.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That is not what I refer to, Mr. President.

Mr. SMOOT. I am speaking of the great ranges of mountains that extend for miles and miles where there is not a foot of agricultural land to be found. I am not speaking of the lowlands or the rolling hills where there are agricultural lands, but I am speaking of the mountainous land which everyone knows is not agricultural land, and the great majority of the 160,000,000 acres within the forest lands are that class of lands. It will take no time to classify them.

Therefore, Mr. President, I believe the Secretary of Agriculture has now started upon a policy that should have been started upon years ago. I believe, also, that the policy to-day is not to add to forest reserves grazing lands or agricultural lands of any kind. I do not believe that there has been an addition made to any forest reserve in the last year, unless it has been upon petitions from the people who are living near the reserve.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, just one moment. The Senator very well knows that petitions of those living near the reserves are not always to be depended upon. The Senator very well knows that he himself within the last week, as well as I myself, failed to recommend the passage of a bill to this body which was sustained by the request of the people living near the reserve, where the request was made that there be added to the reserve certain land below the timber that was grazing land. The Senator knows very well that sometimes people with interested motives ask for legislation that they do not get. The people living near the forest reserve asked that that land be added to the forest reserve simply so that they could control it for their own grazing. So when the Senator says that a forest reserve is created or added to by petition, I say that is not an evidence that the reserve ought to be created or added to.

Mr. SMOOT. But I call the Senator's attention to the fact that if they were adding to these reserves as they have been added to in the past, the land would have been more than likely added to the reserve without asking Congress for authority to do so.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I have an idea that it might have been added if they had not come to Congress.

Mr. SMOOT. I think not, because when the Secretary of the Interior was asked for his opinion as to whether there were any reasons why the bill should not be considered favorably and passed, he stated that it was a grazing proposition only, and it was upon that report that the Committee on Public Lands refused to report the bill favorably.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator will remember that the proper official also added that he had no objection to its being included in the reserve, although, in fact, he knew it was grazing land, and grazing land only.

Mr. SMOOT. Provided Congress should desire to do it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. If the committee of the Senate had been as favorable to the forest-reserve proposition, we would have had an open, free example of the fact that lands might be added to forest reserves even when they are acknowledged not to be timberlands.

Mr. SMOOT. To show that those in favor of the forestry policy are not in favor of adding grazing lands to forest reserves I point to the fact that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] voted against the bill. I believe there was only one member of the committee who voted for it. Therefore it is the policy of the committee, the policy of Congress, the policy of the Forestry Service, the policy of the Secretary of the Interior, the policy of the Secretary of Agriculture not to add to the forest reserve lands that are suitable only for grazing purposes.

Mr. President, there has been some criticism offered on the policy of the Forest Service in the matter of grazing permits. In the management of grazing on the national forests the ranges are divided in accordance with the needs and the conditions of each locality. In some forests the ranges are divided into individual allotments and in other forests in community allotments or general grazing districts used by a number of stockmen. Wherever fences are necessary for the proper control and handling of the stock they are allowed. Over 2,100 miles of drift fences have been constructed on the national forests for the purpose of improving grazing conditions and enabling the stockmen to better control their stock.

In many localities it has been absolutely impracticable to divide the ranges into individual pastures, for the reason that there was such a large number of small owners using the range. For example, in the Manti National Forest, in Utah, there are over 1,000 different owners grazing less than 20,000 head of cattle, or an average of less than 20 head each.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. FALL. Do those owners reside on the forest reserve or off of it?

Mr. SMOOT. Some of them reside within the reserve, but most of them reside off the reserve.

Mr. FALL. How many individual owners does the Senator say there are?

Mr. SMOOT. There are over 1,000 owners of cattle using permits. The total of the permits amounts to about 20,000 head of stock, which means an average of not to exceed 20 head to each allotment.

Mr. FALL. Exactly. I want to say to the Senator that I have here or will have here in a moment or two some maps showing the forest reserves in New Mexico, where there are hundreds of homestead entries made in the one portion of New Mexico, where artificial irrigation is not necessary, and where the forest reserve was thrown around after those people got their patents; and now it is necessary for every one of them to have a permit before his milch cow can cross his fence. That is exactly the condition the Senator is speaking of.

Mr. SMOOT. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that every man who lives within the forest reserve has a preferential right against every other man in the State.

Mr. FALL. In other words, a preferential right to pay his money when his cow crosses his fence. That is what you mean by a preferential right.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, if he grazes his cow on Government lands within the forest reserve he is charged whatever proportion other men are charged for grazing their cattle within the same reserve.

Mr. FALL. The Senator says "whatever proportion." Does he mean to say that he has any preference, that he gets his credit for any less? Does he not pay the amount fixed for that entire forest reserve?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I mean to say that if he has 160 acres of land in the forest reserve and has a permit to graze 20 head of cattle he is allowed credit for the grazing value of his land within the reserve, provided it is open and not fenced.

Mr. FALL. Certainly; and then his preferential right simply means that he has a first right to pay for a grazing permit.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; and I know many men who buy land and live within a forest reserve for the very purpose of getting the preferential right. I say to the Senator that as far as the permits are concerned, they are transferable with the sale of sheep or cattle and are very, very valuable. The transfers——

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator permit me? If they are valuable, then why should they not belong to the people?

Mr. SMOOT. They do belong to the people.

Mr. FALL. By paying a toll for salaries.

Mr. SMOOT. Not a toll for the permits. Moneys are collected for grazing and sales of timber.

Mr. FALL. What becomes of the money that they pay?

Mr. SMOOT. Twenty-five per cent of it goes to the State and 75 per cent goes to the Government of the United States.

Mr. FALL. And where does it go from the Government of the United States? It goes for salaries for these people who collect the money from the people.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, Congress decides the question whether it wants to appropriate money for the administration of the Forest Service or not.

Mr. FALL. I ask the Senator if it is not a fact that it goes back in salaries; that the people who collect 100 cents give 25 cents to the local people and retain 75 per cent for their salaries, and then they come here asking for a deficiency appropriation every year? Is not that a fact?

Mr. SMOOT. All the revenue from the forest reserves, whether revenue from grazing or revenue from the sale of timber or whatever it may be, of course goes into the Treasury of the United States, with a deduction of 25 per cent, which goes to the State in which the particular forest reserve is located.

Mr. FALL. But the Senator, in making the assertion that it goes to the Treasury of the United States, might leave it to be inferred for some other purpose than to pay the salaries or expenses of the Forest Reserve Service.

Mr. SMOOT. That particular money could be appropriated to the building of battleships or to pay the salary of the President of the United States——

Mr. FALL. Then I want to say——

Mr. SMOOT. Just a moment, and then I will gladly yield. I say it may go toward paying the salary of the President of the United States or any other expense of the Government. I am not claiming that the receipts from the forest reserves are sufficient to pay the expenses of administering the forest reserves. I made no such statement. But it has been the policy of the Government to create these reserves and it has been the policy of the Government to provide means for the maintenance of them.

Mr. FALL and Mr. BORAH addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. To whom does the Senator from Utah yield?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield first to the Senator from New Mexico and then to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. FALL. I wish to ask the Senator what is the ultimate object of this policy? What are you going to do with these reserves?

Mr. SMOOT. I thought the Senator understood that thoroughly.

Mr. FALL. I am sorry to say that I am ignorant, and I will be delighted to be enlightened by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. The policy of the Government in relation to the forest reserves is for the preservation of the timber—I mean in its broadest sense—and protection against monopoly of the timber within the reserves.

Mr. FALL. Why do you protect them, unless you expect to use them for the benefit of the people?

Mr. SMOOT. That is what is being done. The Forest Service is selling the timber just as fast as applications are made for it. I was very much surprised to hear the statement made by the Senator to-day in relation to a mine in New Mexico—that it was within 50 miles of standing timber on a forest reserve and yet the company could not get the privilege to cut a foot of the timber, but had to send some $600,000 to Oregon to buy timber to be used by the company for mining purposes. I ask the Senator, Did the company ever make application for the purchase of timber in the reserve that he spoke of?

Mr. FALL. I do not know whether it did or not.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, if it did not make an application, it would not have the right to cut and remove the timber; but if it made application and the application was denied, I want to say that it is different from the policy followed by the Forest Service in any other forest reserve in the United States. I do not know of a forest reserve in the United States where there is standing matured timber and an application is made for it by a citizen or a company that the request has not been granted upon the payment of the stumpage value of the timber.

Mr. FALL. The Senator is so much wiser in that respect, as well as many others, than some of us that he doubtless knows how to do things on a forest reserve that we can not do. I made the assertion, and I make it again, that it is true. There are forest reserves in New Mexico and in Arizona within 50 miles of the Mexican border, and within 50 miles of that border, in one mine alone, $641,000 worth of Oregon timber was put in in 1907. That timber was brought from Oregon. If it could have been obtained from a forest reserve there, would not the people have obtained it there rather than bring it down the coast a thousand miles and then by railroads into New Mexico? Is that common sense?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not question the word of the Senator that that amount of timber was brought from Oregon and the money paid to Oregon for the lumber, but I ask the Senator whether an application was ever made by the company for the timber that he says was within 50 miles of the mine. I do not know whether it is true or not true that an application was made.

Mr. FALL. Nor do I know whether it is true or not true, but I know that the forest reserve in New Mexico sold $42,000 worth of timber last year. One Indian reservation alone has sold this year 130,000,000 feet of standing timber—more than all the forest reserves have sold for 5 or 10 years.

But I know further that, fortunately for the people of New Mexico, the land grants to railroads cover some timber and that companies have been able to purchase that land from the railroads, and the people of New Mexico can obtain lumber from the timber cut from such land. But if it were not for that, if those land grants had not been made before this forest-reserve policy was initiated, which the Senator is defending, so that the timber could be utilized, I presume that it would be necessary for us to go to Oregon for every board which we might put in a house.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. SMOOT. In just a moment. I wish to say to the Senator that I do not approve of a policy of the Forest Service that withholds timber from use by the citizens of any State in which the forest reserve is located.

Mr. FALL. Let us see——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from New Mexico please observe the rule? He must first address the Chair and get permission from the Senator having the floor before he can interrupt him.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that if such a thing has happened upon any forest reserve in New Mexico I will condemn it and say it is not right, and the regulations effecting that reserve should be changed.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Now, will the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FALL. The Senator from New Mexico had addressed the Chair, been recognized, and then taken his seat. Then the Senator from Utah addressed the Senator from New Mexico and the Senator from New Mexico arose to answer, as he understood, the question propounded by the Senator from Utah. Now, Mr. President, let us see if we can get at the idea of the Senator. That I may not be out of order again, I would ask the Senator to let me put my question and then he can answer it categorically.

First, what is Senator's idea of the policy or of the ultimate object to be obtained by these forest reservations? Is it or is it not a business proposition? Is it not for the purpose of disposing of the mature and fallen timber and reforesting those reservations so that the ordinary amount of timber may be preserved for future generations? In other words, that we may do exactly as Germany and some other foreign countries have done, that we may sell for the use of the people a certain amount of the timber each year of the mature stuff as it comes on, and at the same time reforest the area so that 20 or 50 or 100 years from now there may be possibly as much timber as there is at the present time upon that reserve? Is that the object?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator has stated one of the objects of the forest reserve very clearly, and I will accept the statement of the Senator as being a true statement of one of the objects of the Forest Service.

As far as the business proposition is concerned, the only business that is connected with it is that the citizen or the corporation that applies for timber—that is, the mature or down timber—is compelled to pay a certain stumpage rate. Now, does the Senator object to that?

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator not only that I do not object to it but that is exactly my idea of the policy which should be carried out. I do not object to the forest reserves. I join the Senator from Wyoming in saying that as to the preservation or the conservation, pursued properly, I would not object to it.

Mr. SMOOT. I can not see that the Senator and I are very far apart.

Mr. FALL. We are so far apart that there is no possibility of our getting together when the Senator defends the present policy of the department in the administration of the forest reserves.

Mr. SMOOT. I just told the Senator that I would condemn it as strongly as he could possibly condemn it if the policy was as stated by him, and I am surprised if such a policy has been carried out upon any reserve in New Mexico.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I regret to see that the Senator from New Mexico and the Senator from Utah can not possibly get together. I think that perhaps I can suggest a plan which, if the Forest Service would see fit to consider it, might settle this question of the timber.

The Senator from New Mexico says that several thousand dollars' worth of timber was brought from Oregon or Washington for mining purposes in New Mexico when timber lay right at their doors, and that they could not get it from the Forest Service, which had it in superabundance. I believe that this is the reason why they could not get it, and I think it is worthy of consideration in connection with this whole subject matter.

I believe that the way is open for the Forest Service to do what the Department of Justice has not been able to do, to do what the whole legal department of this Government has been unable to do, and that is to stop once and for all the imposition of the Lumber Trust, if there be such a thing in this country. Let the Government of the United States take this timberland, which is equal in acreage to the timberland that is held in private ownership, and offer it at a reasonable price to sawmill men; let the sawmill men go and work on the timber that ought to be sawed for the protection of the forests, and let them put that timber on the market at a reasonable profit. Then we will see whether or not New Mexico goes to Oregon and Washington for lumber. New Mexico will then buy the lumber that lies at her door.

The difficulty in the situation heretofore has been that when the Forest Service want to sell timber they do not sell it in relation to its cost of production. They sell it at the price which is fixed by the great lumber people. They do not compel the great lumber people to come down, but raise the price of their lumber to what the big lumber people charge.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from New Mexico—because I am deeply interested in this question of refusal on the part of the Forest Service to allow timber to be cut from the reserve—whether the timber that he speaks of being within 50 miles of the mine was in New Mexico or was it located in another State?

Mr. FALL. It was in New Mexico and Arizona.

Mr. SMOOT. It was in both States?

Mr. FALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, if it had all been included in Arizona, there may have been some reason for not shipping it from one State to the other. I simply asked the question, however, for information, because I want to look up the question myself and learn if such a thing has happened, and if so, why. If the application was made and the company was refused the use of the timber for mining purposes or any other purpose, I think the action was wrong.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. FALL. I have stated to the Senator that I do not know whether an application had been made to purchase this timber or not. I know as a business man, and I think the Senator also knows as a business man, that a business concern will likely purchase timber at the nearest available point and for the best price it can be obtained. I think the Senator would agree, without the figures being placed before him, that it certainly should be possible for timber to be cut from a forest reserve in New Mexico within 50 to 100 miles of a mine, granting that a railroad reached the forest reserve, which it did, and that it could be sold as cheaply as it would be possible to transport that timber from the great timber fields of Oregon.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no doubt of it.

Mr. FALL. I simply state the fact. I know nothing about the application. I stated to the Senator a moment ago that I have some maps in my possession of certain forest reserves which I referred to yesterday. It is impossible to get these maps in the RECORD, but if the Senator is interested in this proposition I should like to show him just one or two of our forest reserves in New Mexico.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator mean as to the extent?

Mr. FALL. The capacity and the private land entries, what they have undertaken to do in what they call a forest reserve.

Mr. SMOOT. As to the extent of withdrawals, does the Senator mean?

Mr. FALL. Yes. I mean to say that we have an agricultural country there which people are continuously entering for agricultural purposes, and the forest reserve has been so extended that it is impossible for them to take up any further these numbered sections.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I know that the policy has been from the very creation of forest reserves that wherever there has been a considerable amount of land entered by private individuals not to include the entries within the boundaries of a forest. By that I do not mean to say that there has never been an addition to a forest reserve in which there had been private holdings, because I know that there have been private holdings included in an addition to forest reserves. I know there have been ranches that have been used for years and years that have been included in an addition. I am fully aware of that.

Mr. HEYBURN. Even towns and villages.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Idaho suggests that there have been towns and villages included within the forest reserves. Of course that has never happened in my own State, but I have heard the Senator from Idaho state it on several occasions.

Looking at the map of New Mexico, I notice that there are a great many quarter sections that have been entered by private parties, and there must be some good reason; there must be a reason, one that I can not explain from looking at the map, why the private holdings were added to the reserve; but, in my opinion, in a case where lands have been entered by private parties to the extent that this map shows, it would have been better to have left them out of the reserve.

Mr. President, in relation to the sale of timber in New Mexico and Arizona, there have been from fifty to seventy-five million feet sold annually by the national forests in New Mexico and Arizona. A great deal of that is for local consumption by mining companies. So far as I know, no application for timber from such companies has been denied, as I have heretofore stated. Therefore, I asked the question of the Senator whether the application had been denied, and the Senator said that he did not know. I say to the Senator that if the application was made, if the timber was matured—as I know it must have been, or the Senator would not make the statement he has—and if the application was refused it was a gross violation of the rules and regulations of the Forest Service and should be condemned.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. FALL. Whether or not an application was made for the purchase of this timber, what has the Senator to say with reference to a policy which will exclude from the market the timber for which there is such a demand as I have instanced right at their doors? If they have the timber, could they not have sold it, and what was that policy when they did not offer to sell it?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think there is a citizen in the United States but knows that wherever there is matured timber in a forest reserve an application can be made for it and the Government will gladly sell it. It can be cut into logs or lumber for local use, or shipped wherever desired. That is the policy of the Forest Service, as I understand it. If it has not been carried out, I condemn it just as strongly as does the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. President, proceeding with the question of using fences on reserves, I will say it would be utterly impossible to fence the reserves in my State. But, upon the other hand, in the Nebraska forest, where the conditions absolutely require fencing for the control of the stock, the entire forest is fenced and divided into individual pastures. The Forest Service is governed very largely in this matter by the desires of the stockmen and undertakes to make divisions of the range in such manner as is satisfactory to them and will bring the best results.

In Utah it is impossible to fence, while in Nebraska it is best to fence. The policy of the Forest Service has been to fence in Nebraska and not fence in Utah. All the service desires is to get the best results from the grazing lands, no matter where located.

In cases where watering places located in the national forests are used in connection with range outside the boundaries, if the stockmen desire to allow the stock to cross at freedom and graze back and forth across the national forest lands, they are required to secure a grazing permit for a portion of their stock proportionate with the area of national forest lands within the range, but in no case is a charge made for the privilege of merely crossing the forest. The minimum rate for grazing cattle on the national forests is 35 cents per head, while the minimum rate charged for grazing on Indian reservations is $1 per head.

So far as limited grazing charges are concerned, I am in full accord with the Senator from New Mexico. I do not believe that the Forest Service should charge every settler who has a horse or a cow or a beef steer all that it is possible to get out of him. The policy has been, so far as the Forest Service is concerned, to charge per season 35 cents a head for cattle, while upon every Indian reservation in the country the price has been $1 a head.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. FALL. I want to say to the Senator, and that, too, speaking of what we all know personally—my ranch in New Mexico adjoins the Mescalero Apache Indian Reservation and the Alamo Forest Reserve. Unfortunately, I have not been able to secure a lease upon the Mescalero Apache Reserve; but I have secured permits for grazing upon the Alamo Forest Reserve and the Lincoln Forest Reserve. I want to say to the Senator from Utah that I would pay $1 per head for my cattle under the system on the Indian reserves, and I would rather pay 25 cents a head for my sheep under the policy pursued on the Indian reserves than to pay 20 cents for cattle and 5 cents for sheep under the policy pursued on the forest reserves.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, then I will take my own State, and show the policy where the conditions are exactly the same. I know that in the State of Utah the forest reserve does not charge one-quarter for grazing sheep upon certain lands in Utah what it costs men who have bid for the grazing privileges upon similar lands. The only Government reclamation project in the State of Utah has some 52,000 acres withdrawn for construction purposes. For the last three or four years that 52,000 acres has been leased to the highest bidder, and the number of sheep that can be grazed upon it makes the cost of grazing each head of sheep nearly 30 cents, while the lands adjoining the withdrawal, as well as in any forest reserve in the State, are grazed by sheep at a rate not exceeding one-quarter of that amount.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah if he does not think, if these forest reserves were turned over to the State of Utah—those that are situated in the State of Utah—that the State could manage them just as wisely and just as much in the interest of the people as the United States Government does?

Mr. SMOOT. I certainly think the State of Utah would do so. The Forest Service has never undertaken to sell the grazing privileges in the national forests on a commercial basis, which inevitably results in the grazing privileges falling into the hands of a few, but has undertaken to preserve a wide distribution of grazing privileges among the people dependent upon the use of the range and collect only a moderate charge for the grazing privileges.

I know that is the case as to all the forests of which I have made an examination.

The criticism was made by the Senator from New Mexico that private or county roads could not be constructed within the national forests. It is evident that the Senator has confused the national forests with the Indian reservations, as not only wagon roads may be constructed within the national forests, but rights of way for telephone and telegraph lines, railways, canals, irrigation ditches, and so forth, may be secured on the national forests under the existing law; but such rights of way may be secured on Indian reservations only by acts of Congress. Over 300 private and county roads were constructed within the national forests last year under the provisions of the existing regulations, and over 1,200 miles of such roads have been built within the national forests.

Mr. President, I expected to occupy but a few moments when I arose. I desire to again state to the Senate that it is not so much the question of the creation of forest reserves that has caused such bitter criticism, but the past administration—and much of it has been misdirected. There is not a western Senator who does not know that there should be changes made in the land laws, yet we have never been able to get together and agree upon a definite policy. I look to see the time when we shall agree upon such a policy. Whether it will result in turning over all the public lands to the States in which those lands are located, I can not say.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield further to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does not the Senator from Utah think, in view of the fact that the public-land problem is a totally different thing in Arizona from what it is in Nebraska, and a rather different thing in New Mexico from what it is in Utah or Nevada, pretty nearly a different thing in every State, that the only really satisfactory way of having it attended to in the right manner is to have it attended to in different manners; and that, therefore, the only proper remedy for the existing evil is to turn the public lands over to the States in which they exist and let the States manage them, each one in accordance with local conditions?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it certainly would then rest upon the people of the State whether or not such lands were administered properly, or whether or not they were administered according to the desires of the people of the State. My opinion is that, with certain restrictions, they would be so administered.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But would the States not be very much more apt to administer them properly than the department at Washington, which would have to make all of these regulations under what is, upon the face of it, at any rate, a uniform law?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if western Senators and Representatives could agree upon some general policy—I mean a policy as to whether there should be any reservation in the granting of rights to settlers within the State—I believe that that would be the proper policy to pursue, and I believe Congress would agree to it. I hope to see the day when this question will be settled, and every year when the agricultural appropriation bill is up that we shall not have to thrash this same question over and over again. The land laws are not applicable to conditions in many of the States; but the difficulty is not so much with the law as it is with the administration of the law. I must admit, however, that the laws are such that the strictest examinations must be made, but they should be made all at once and not take years to accomplish.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will pardon me, after all, if it is a Federal law it would have to be uniform. If you make public-land laws applicable to the conditions in Utah, they would not be applicable to Mississippi and Alabama, where there are yet a few public lands, though not many, or to Arkansas, where there are a great many. I see no way out of it except by local self-government and laws adapted to the conditions of each locality.

Mr. SMOOT. I notice that that idea is growing very rapidly in the United States.

Mr. President, I have not examined into the details of this bill; I have not had time to do so; and I do not know whether the appropriations contained in it are too large or too small. I have been so crowded with other work that it has been impossible for me to pay any particular attention to it; but I do know that although there has been a question raised as to the appropriation for the preservation of the timber through the fighting of fires, the appropriation for that purpose is a most important one.

Reference has been made to the fire loss of timber amounting to $25,000,000. I believe, estimating the stumpage value at a very low rate, that more than that amount was destroyed last year. Of course, I do not say that none of that timber would not have been destroyed if the appropriations for fire protection had been greater; but I do claim that if an appropriation had not been made the timber loss of this country last year would have been greater.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I want to ask leave to insert in the RECORD in connection with this discussion a section of the original act creating the Department of Agriculture. It is contained in volume 12 of the United States Statutes at Large, page 387. I do it merely for the purpose of showing the original intention of the creation of this department of the Government. It may be a surprise to some Senators. It was passed on May 15, 1862:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby established at the seat of Government of the United States a Department of Agriculture, the general designs and duties of which shall be to acquire and to diffuse among the people of the United States useful information on subjects connected with agriculture in the most general and comprehensive sense of the word, and to procure, propagate, and distribute among the people new and valuable seeds and plants.

That is the entire scope of the purpose of the department. At that time the principal officer was denominated the Commissioner of Agriculture. It so remained until February 9, 1889, when Congress enacted the law creating the existing Department of Agriculture, without extending its powers, but merely providing—

That the Department of Agriculture shall be an executive department, under the supervision and control of a Secretary of Agriculture, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Then the act provides for the officers. I merely read that to show the possible enlargement of a department of the Government by usage and ancient right.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee in line 19, on page 29, which the Secretary will again state.

The SECRETARY. On page 29, line 19, after the word "each," it is proposed to strike out "54 forest rangers, at $1,100 each."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 32, line 10, after the word "and," to strike out "thirty thousand three" and insert "thirty-five thousand seven."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NELSON. Are other amendments now in order, or have all the committee amendments been disposed of?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There remain some committee amendments which have been passed over.

Mr. NELSON. Very well.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the portion of the bill heretofore passed over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That completes the committee amendments and the reading of the bill.

Mr. WARREN. There was an amendment, or possibly two amendments, passed over on page 88.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary advises the Chair that on page 53 an amendment was passed over. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the top of page 53 it is proposed to insert the following:

Any contract or agreement heretofore or hereafter made for the sale of timber or other products of the national forests may be modified, altered, or canceled by the Secretary of Agriculture upon the application of the purchaser whenever the purchaser shall show to the satisfaction of the Secretary that, owing to conditions beyond the purchaser's control and arising subsequent to the execution of the contract, the enforcement thereof will work serious hardship or injustice to the purchaser: Provided, That the United States shall in all such cases be fully reimbursed for any expenses or damages incurred in connection with said contract: Provided further, That in no case shall the stumpage price stipulated in the contract or agreement be reduced by such modification or alteration: And provided also, That nothing herein shall be construed to limit the authority of the Secretary of Agriculture to modify, alter, or cancel any such contract or agreement for violation of its terms.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to make an inquiry of the chairman regarding this amendment. Under it, as I understand, power is given to extend contracts for payment of stumpage, but not to vary the price—not to reduce the price.

Mr. BURNHAM. I wish simply to say in answer to the question that it authorizes the Secretary to extend the time. It does not authorize a change of price. The price will not be diminished, and in this bill it is said:

Provided, That the United States shall in all such cases be fully reimbursed for any expenses or damages incurred in connection with said contract.

It seems to me the Government of the United States would be protected.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I have no objection to the amendment, but I wish to inquire in this connection of the chairman what is the average stumpage price for lumber?

Mr. BURNHAM. I think $2.56 this year; $2.44 last year.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to ask him whether the maintenance of that price—the price which is charged, as I understand, by other owners of timberlands, particularly the great combinations—does not have a tendency to maintain too high a price for the average cost of lumber.

Mr. BURNHAM. I think the price is based upon the market price in the first instance, and that is ascertained from the——

Mr. NEWLANDS. But if the market price is fixed by the Lumber Trust——

Mr. BURNHAM. I grant that.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Does it not mean that the Government is helping the trust to maintain the price?

Mr. BURNHAM. It is not the purpose of the Government.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It is not the purpose of the Government; I know that; but I was inquiring as to the effect of it.

Mr. BURNHAM. It may be indirectly, but the idea of the Government, as I understand, is to hold this merchantable timber so that it shall not be sold at a bankrupt price, less than it is worth.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not doubt that the intention of the department is all right, but I am merely inquiring as to the effect, and it seems to me it is an inquiry which should be considered by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry when it considers the next agricultural appropriation bill.

I was struck with the thought of the Senator from Iowa that if the Government is to enter into a combination in restraint of trade we can not expect to reach an era of lower prices.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator in charge of this bill has fully comprehended the meaning of the amendment. The amendment reads:

Any contract or agreement heretofore or hereafter made for the sale of timber or other products of the national forests may be modified, altered, or canceled by the Secretary of Agriculture.

It looks to me that that is a very bad discretion to give to the Secretary; that it is unbusinesslike and improper, and we ought not to authorize him to change it.

Mr. BURNHAM. I do not care to debate the question at length. I will submit it to the Senate, if necessary. I understand the fact is that sometimes the contracts lose all effect because the contractor loses his market and the sale is lost. If he can go along with a little leeway with respect to time in which he is enabled to complete his contract, it is to the advantage of the Government. Several instances have been submitted to the committee as bearing out this contention.

Mr. LODGE. Does not this amendment do more than to enable the Secretary to extend the time?

Mr. BURNHAM. It is simply this: These contracts contain a provision that a certain quantity of timber shall be cut each year. The contract must be accomplished within a certain time. Now, if the contractor finds that he can not complete the cutting of so much timber within the year, he fails in his contract. The object here is to give another year, or two years possibly.

Mr. LODGE. But the language is "modify, alter, or cancel."

Mr. BURNHAM. It modifies it to that extent.

Mr. LODGE. It certainly is not limited to extending the time. If it said simply that the Secretary should have power to extend the time, that would be one thing. But this goes much further than that. I do not know anything about the merits of the amendment, for I am not sufficiently familiar with the subject.

Mr. BURNHAM. There is this provision: That whatever may be lost in expenses or in damages shall be reimbursed to the Government.

Mr. WATSON. I should like to ask a question. If the Government makes a bad contract and wants to get out of it, is there any way provided by this amendment to allow it to do so?

Mr. BURNHAM. The Senator knows very well that a contract may be one-sided. That is true.

Mr. WATSON. I shall object to this amendment and ask for a vote on it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Do I understand that if I made a contract last year to pay $2.54 for stumpage the Government has a right, if lumber should go up, to cancel that contract and make me pay $2.75?

Mr. BURNHAM. I understand that the contracts run for five years, and there is a chance under these contracts to readjust the amount according to the value of stumpage at the time.

Mr. WATSON. I make the point of order that the amendment proposes new legislation.

Mr. BURNHAM. I suppose the point of order is good.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is sustained. The next passed over amendment will be stated.

The next passed over amendment was, on page 53, line 18, after the word "millions," to strike out "one hundred and thirty thousand two hundred" and insert "four hundred and fifty-nine thousand," so as to read:

Total for Forest Service, $5,459,045.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next passed over amendment was, on page 88, line 2, before the word "dollars," to strike out "two hundred thousand" and insert "one million," so as to read:

Fighting and preventing forest fires in emergency: For fighting and preventing forest fires in cases of extraordinary emergency, $1,000,000.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. HEYBURN. There is objection to it. That is a committee amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is a committee amendment. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment. Does the Senator from Idaho desire to discuss it?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

Mr. President, as it has been shown that it does not cost any such sum for that purpose, it seems to me it is reckless in the appropriation for fighting and preventing fires to raise it to $1,000,000.

Mr. WARREN. That is entirely an emergency appropriation.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then it should have inserted the words "or so much thereof as may be necessary."

Mr. WARREN. That is understood, of course. I think I said two days ago in debating the subject that the occasion of that amendment was the big fires which exhausted the appropriation of two years ago and created a deficiency, for which we provided something like $700,000 or $800,000 in the deficiency bill. For next year the department suggested that there should be $100,000 emergency appropriation——

Mr. HEYBURN. Made available?

Mr. WARREN. That it should be made available, in case it should be needed. They used of this the next year only $22,000, showing that the department was entirely within bounds in respecting it as an emergency clause. In case of a great emergency there would hardly be authority for the Secretary to incur the expense unless he did it as before under an emergency, which, I think, the Senator from Idaho thinks is precarious ground to tread upon in the expenditure of money.

Mr. HEYBURN. I only rose to suggest an amendment, to insert after the word "dollars" the words "or so much thereof as may be necessary." That goes to the question of the available balance in the Treasury against which appropriations may be made. Are we going to withdraw a million dollars in the beginning, without knowing whether we will need it or not? There is no reason on earth for withdrawing, on paper, from the available cash in the Treasury a million dollars, and by inserting the words "or so much thereof as may be necessary," those investigating the available balance in the Treasury will be put on guard. I move to insert the words "or so much thereof as may be necessary."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "dollars," in line 2, page 88, it is proposed to insert "or so much thereof as may be necessary."

Mr. BURNHAM. I accept it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Do I understand that it is an increase of $800,000 in that item?

Mr. WARREN. It is not. We may have in a certain year a very extreme succession of fires. It cost last year $700,000 more than we had appropriated.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is this a deficit?

Mr. WARREN. There was a deficit, and it was taken care of in the deficiency bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. All right.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment is agreed to, and the amendment as amended is agreed to. The next passed-over amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 88, after line 19, it is proposed to insert the following words:

> And in order to carry out the purposes mentioned in section 3 of the act of March 1, 1911, entitled "An act to enable any State to cooperate with any other State or States, or with the United States, for the protection of the watersheds of navigable streams, and to appoint a commission for the acquisition of lands for the purpose of conserving the navigability of navigable rivers," there is hereby appropriated and made available until expended so much of the maximum sums mentioned in said section for the fiscal years 1912 to 1915, inclusive, as shall remain unexpended at the close of each of said fiscal years.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is a very carelessly drawn amendment. In line 24 it gives authority to appoint a commission for the acquisition of lands for the purposes mentioned. Who is to appoint the commission?

Mr. GALLINGER. The commission is appointed under the law.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is a mere recital of the statute.

Mr. GALLINGER. A mere recital of the statute.

Mr. HEYBURN. I understand that, but it does not follow that we must make a continuing appropriation for that purpose. We should appropriate such sum as is necessary to make effective the existing law. But this appropriates the money until expended. We are not in the habit of doing that in legislation. I move to strike out the words "as shall remain unexpended at the close of each of said fiscal years," to be found in lines 5 and 6, page 89.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am sorry the Senator from Idaho has thought it necessary to attack this little amendment. The law which was enacted and which was approved March 1, 1911, makes an appropriation in these words:

> SEC. 3. That there is hereby appropriated, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, the sum of $1,000,000, and for each fiscal year thereafter a sum not to exceed $2,000,000 for use in the examination, survey, and acquirement of lands located on the headwaters of navigable streams or those which are being or which may be developed for navigable purposes: Provided, That the provisions of this section shall expire by limitation on the 30th of June, 1915.

Mr. President, under that law the first two annual appropriations have been turned back into the Treasury for the reason that the Geological Survey, which has something to do with the administration of this law, was not prepared to make report. So that $3,000,000 have already been lost. For the present year the Geological Survey has not reported on the White Mountain region, but will doubtless make a report in a few days. Lands have been purchased in the South, in two States of the South, I think, under this appropriation, and not an acre as yet has been acquired in the North. The amendment merely provides that the unexpended balance of the $2,000,000 of the present year, if there shall be an unexpended balance, may be applicable to the succeeding year. It takes no money out of the Treasury beyond that appropriated by this act from which I have read, but enables these forest reservations to get, after losing $3,000,000, the remainder of what was provided for in the statute I have quoted.

I think the Senator upon reconsideration will see that this is not bad legislation, and that we may well do it. Whether we are in the habit every day of doing that particular thing or not, it seems to me we can do this, and in this case we ought to do it; and I hope the Senator will not urge his objection.

Mr. HEYBURN. I had this in mind. This is the Appalachian——

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; the Appalachian and White Mountain Reserves.

Mr. HEYBURN. And the sums appropriated have not all been expended. Under the law they should be returned to the Treasury. That is the rule which applies to all appropriations.

Mr. GALLINGER. The $3,000,000 has been covered back into the Treasury for the first two years.

Mr. HEYBURN. What is the sum involved in this amendment that would be continued?

Mr. GALLINGER. This commission, of which I happen to be a member, is authorized under the statute to spend $2,000,000 for the present fiscal year. The probability is that in view of the fact that a scientific bureau of the Government has taken an inordinate length of time to make a report upon it, that the $2,000,000 will not all be expended. Every dollar that has thus far been expended has been expended in certain of the Southern States, which I am glad was done, and there will unquestionably be a balance, greater or less, of the $2,000,000 not expended when the 30th day of June arrives. What we want to do, and what I think we ought to be permitted to do, is to apply that unexpended balance to the purchases of next year.

Mr. HEYBURN. Is not that a violation of the general law in regard to returning to the Treasury at the end of the fiscal year unexpended balances?

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not know about that. I am not familiar with that law.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have no desire to deprive this enterprise of necessary funds to carry out its purposes and would vote for such an appropriation as might be estimated for. But this violates the rule of estimates as well as the general law in regard to covering into the Treasury the balance unexpended at the end of the year. I think that the appropriation should be made direct.

Mr. GALLINGER. Supposing that by this provision in the pending bill we make a new law so far as this particular item is concerned. Have we not authority to do that?

Mr. HEYBURN. Have we ever done it?

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not know whether we have or not. It is extraordinary if we have not done it. I can not conceive of anything we have not done since I have been a Member of this body.

Mr. HEYBURN. I only speak in the interest of regularity in legislation making appropriations. This is a large unexpended balance.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; it may be much or small. The probability is it will be small. We are not asking you to give us the $3,000,000 that have already been lost. We are simply looking forward to the utilization of the $2,000,000 for the present year that under the law we are entitled to, but a portion of which we will probably lose from the fact that the Geological Survey, as I say, has taken a very long time to make their investigation.

Mr. HEYBURN. We must concede that this $2,000,000 might now or between now and the ending of the present fiscal year be expended. The existing law authorizes that.

Mr. GALLINGER. If that should be done there will be no unexpended balance.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then what will we do for the next year?

Mr. GALLINGER. We will have $2,000,000 more for next year under the statute.

Mr. HEYBURN. This will give you $4,000,000 for you to expend if you do not spend all of the existing balance before the end of the present fiscal year.

Mr. GALLINGER. No. I think we have expended a million up to the present time.

Mr. HEYBURN. Out of the two millions?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is a million dollars' balance.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is simply a guess. I am not speaking accurately. We have made purchases in two or three Southern States to a considerable extent, and I have no accurate information as to the precise amount that has been invested in those projects.

Mr. HEYBURN. We have had this question up, and I think the Senator at that time was in accord with the views I express now, when the Forest Service retained in its hands the proceeds of forests and did not turn them into the Treasury. The question was very sharply debated here at that time as to whether or not they should carry them over into the next year, which they were then in the habit of doing; and I think the Senator joined with those who took a strong hand against carrying money from one year to another in the case of an unexpended balance of an appropriation.

I remember that some of the older Members of this body at that time made very strong protests against recognizing that policy of making appropriations.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is wrong in giving me credit for having participated in that debate. I have not wasted any time on the discussion of the Forest Service. I have left that to other Senators. I have no recollection of even having expressed an opinion about it.

I do remember that when the irrigation service needed additional money, although I am not sure whether we reappropriated it or not, we gave an extension of some kind or other. I remember voting with a great deal of pleasure for that proposition, helping that service to accomplish what it had set out to do, but which it had not accomplished because, as it was generally considered, unfortunate management of the projects.

Mr. HEYBURN. I give the Senator from New Hampshire the fullest credit for having at all times shown a friendly disposition to support measures pertaining to the public lands, to the irrigation system, and to the interests generally of that undeveloped or new country.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator from Idaho yield to me?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. So far as concerns the irrigation matter of which he speaks, the Senator is right. The Senator from New Hampshire has always been in favor of assisting along that line. But I may say that of that amount, $20,000,000 which we provided, not one cent has been used, and I do not believe it ever will be.

As to the matter of reappropriating, it is entirely an ordinary thing to do where a specific sum has been appropriated and the negotiations have not been concluded to reappropriate the unexpended balance, not on a proposition such as the Senator mentions, of forestry, where there is a continuing expense, for instance, the pay of the Army or something like that. We do not do that. But it is quite a common occurrence. For instance, where we provide for the purchase of a piece of land at a certain price we may have to go to the courts to secure title. At the end of the year it is quite common to reappropriate the unexpended balance. That applies here, except here you have the money—all that is needed. But reappropriation of unexpended balances is an ordinary proceeding.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is overlapping appropriations. That is what it amounts to. This money was appropriated in the last appropriation bill.

Mr. WARREN. It was appropriated in a special bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is an appropriation bill nevertheless.

I make no suggestions in regard to this for the purpose of antagonizing the scheme of the White Mountain and the Appalachian Forest Reserves. My attention was called to it, as it affected the general system of making appropriations. It is just as easy to appropriate the sum representing the unexpended balance in addition to the other appropriations as it is to inaugurate the new system of carrying over the old appropriation. In other words, making the appropriation of one Congress overlap that of another.

I shall not propose any amendment, but I do not feel that I have been mistaken in calling attention to this method of making appropriations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the committee amendment is agreed to. The next passed-over amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 91, lines 5 and 6, strike out the words "fifteen million nine hundred and thirty-three thousand three hundred and sixty-six" and insert "seventeen million six hundred and fifty-six thousand nine hundred and seventy-six."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr BURNHAM. I ask that the clerks be authorized to correct the totals.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire asks that the clerks be directed to correct the totals.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Would the Senator from New Hampshire mind explaining what that increase of $2,000,000 is for?

Mr. WARREN. It is to correct the footing of the whole bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Merely the footing.

Mr. WARREN. I think we should not adopt the amendment in the terms it is in. I think we should authorize the clerk to put in the proper figures as the footing of the bill when we get through with it. We may insert other items.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The thought of the Chair was that, at the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire, where throughout the bill amendments had been made which would change the footing, the clerks be authorized to correct the totals.

Mr. WARREN. That will be all right. There may be other amendments that may change the totals.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the request of the Senator from New Hampshire is agreed to.

Mr. NELSON. On page 49, after line 4, I move to insert the amendment I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. After line 4, on page 49, it is proposed to insert:

That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby directed and required to select, classify, and segregate, as soon as practicable, all lands within the boundaries of national forests that are suitable and fit for agricultural purposes, and as soon as such lands have been thus selected, classified, and segregated, the same shall be open to settlement and entry under the homestead laws, and the sum of $100,000 is hereby appropriated for the purpose aforesaid.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, my object in offering that amendment is to meet the violent criticisms that have been made against the Forestry Service. It is admitted and can not be disputed that large amounts of agricultural land suitable and proper for agriculture have been included within the limits of the national forests, and that while the law in general terms allows such lands to be taken for homesteads, yet under the existing practice there is an embargo upon the man who wants to take any of this land for homestead purposes. He must first make an application to the Forestry Bureau or the Secretary of Agriculture. Then the Secretary of Agriculture or the Chief Forester refers it over to the local forester, and he refers it to a ranger, and it takes from three months to a year before they finally find out and can determine whether that land can be taken as a homestead or not.

The purpose of this amendment is to require the Secretary of Agriculture to immediately select, segregate, and classify all the lands within forest reservations that are suitable and fit for agricultural purposes, and when they are thus selected and classified and segregated they are to be opened to entry and settlement under the homestead law. It is to get rid of the annoyances that the homestead settlers have now. That is the only purpose and object of the amendment.

Mr. BURNHAM. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. There is already appropriated——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire in charge of the bill has been recognized.

Mr. BURNHAM. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. If I am correct, there is already, according to my recollection, in the provisions of the bill quite a large appropriation for that purpose. I think the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota is entirely appropriate, and I would be glad to support it, but I think there is no occasion for an additional appropriation inasmuch as there is already an appropriation in the bill for doing that very thing.

Mr. NELSON. I make no point in the matter of the appropriation. I only want a positive mandate and direction to the Secretary.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have no objection to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota, then, modifies his amendment.

Mr. NELSON. I suggest to make it $50,000 instead of $100,000.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think the Senator will find, upon investigating the bill, that it is entirely provided for. I think there is an item in the bill much larger than that mentioned by the Senator.

Mr. WARREN. There is an item of $50,000 for survey of agricultural lands within forest reserves.

Mr. NELSON. That is for another purpose.

Mr. WARREN. True; it does not carry the legislation that the Senator proposes.

Mr. NELSON. No; the appropriation should be made for this purpose, but I am willing to make it $50,000 instead of $100,000, and I modify the amendment accordingly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota modifies his amendment so that it will appropriate $50,000 rather than $100,000.

Mr. BURNHAM. This amendment is in accordance with the wish of the Forestry Service, as expressed in a letter read here to-day, and so far as I have authority I accept the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to. It is agreed to.

Mr. NELSON. I have another amendment following that, which I ask to be inserted at the end of line 16, on the same page.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 49, at the end of the committee amendment already agreed to and at the end of line 16, insert:

That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized and directed to sell at actual cost to homestead settlers and farmers for their domestic use the mature dead and down timber on national forests.

Mr. NELSON. I wish to say about that amendment, it appears, if you will study the action of the Forestry Bureau, that they have been guided in the selling of timber on the forest reserves by the prices that the Lumber Trust has charged. They have aimed always to keep in harmony with the rates that they have fixed, and owing to the fact that most of the timber supply of the country now is either within these national forests or is owned by big lumber barons like the Weyerhaeusers and others, the result is that the national forests have given a monopolistic power to these lumber barons. The Forestry Bureau, in selling the timber, aims to keep in harmony with the prices fixed by the lumbermen, the men who own all the rest of the stumpage of the country.

The purpose of this amendment is to enable the homestead settlers and the farmers to secure the timber not for sale or speculation, but for domestic use at cost. I do not believe that the Government should exploit our timber for mere commercial purposes and hold it up and utilize it in the aid of the Lumber Trust.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to ask one question. The Senator means that the Government shall practically contribute this dead timber to the actual homestead settlers, I presume.

Mr. NELSON. That is the object—the mature and dead and down timber for domestic use. Under the amendment they are not authorized to sell it or speculate in it, but they can acquire it for their own domestic use on their farms.

Mr. WARREN. I see no objection to the amendment. I was only wondering how the cost would be determined. The words used are "actual cost."

Mr. NELSON. Of course the Secretary of Agriculture determines that.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator's idea is that the cost would be limited by what? By the cost of administration or by the cost of getting out the timber itself?

Mr. NELSON. By the cost of getting out the timber, whatever it may be, whatever it may cost the Government to dispose of it—the actual cost. In other words, the purpose is that the Government shall not obtain a profit from that kind of people for that kind of lumber.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will ask that the amendment be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be again read.

The SECRETARY. After line 16, on page 49, insert:

That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized and directed to sell at actual cost to homestead settlers and farmers for their domestic use the mature dead and down timber on national forests.

Mr. HEYBURN. To say "the actual cost" might lead to some misunderstanding. It is not supposed that the Government will take this lumber out of the forest reserves and deliver it outside?

Mr. NELSON. Oh, no; that is a matter of regulation. You can not insert all the regulations in a law. But there ought to be a way of ascertaining the actual cost. The object is to prevent them from selling this lumber in competition at the rate fixed by the Lumber Trust.

Mr. HEYBURN. There need be no cost except for the services of the man who supervises the transfer. The person using it should be authorized to go and get it.

Mr. NELSON. The department will establish the necessary regulations. We can not in a law lay down all the details.

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire to say, further, that the purposes should be extended. That class of lumber should be available not only for domestic uses, which I presume is intended to cover consumption, but for the building of houses and cabins and fences, and such purposes.

Mr. NELSON. That is domestic use. There is no doubt about it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Will the provision be sufficient?

Mr. NELSON. Domestic use for the settler.

Mr. HEYBURN. If that is to be understood——

Mr. NELSON. For buildings, stables, cabins, houses, and fences is domestic use for actual farmers. There can not be any doubt about that. I have aimed to put the law in broad and general terms. An intelligent Secretary of Agriculture will have no difficulty in administering that law.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator include the words "forest reserves"? The Chair notices that the amendment does not say "reserves."

Mr. NELSON. They are known in the law now as national forests.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Very good.

Mr. NELSON. That is the technical name.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I understood from the reading of the amendment that this is simply to provide for the use of those who are in communication with these reserves to go and get timber and take it out.

Mr. NELSON. It does not prescribe in what manner it is to be done. We can not lay down a rule.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I ask, What is the design?

Mr. NELSON. The design is that it shall be furnished to them at cost, at what it costs the Government; whether inside or outside of the reservation makes no difference.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I ask to have the amendment read again.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 49, after line 16, insert:

That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized and directed to sell at actual cost to homestead settlers and farmers, for their domestic use, the mature dead and down timber in national forests.

Mr. JONES. I would like to ask the Senator from Minnesota whether, under that amendment, a settler near a forest reserve could go and buy timber, cut it, and haul the logs out to a local sawmill and have it sawed up to build a barn.

Mr. NELSON. That would be discretionary. I do not attempt to lay down any rules. I presume the Secretary of Agriculture would frame the proper rules for disposing of it, whether he would let the farmer go in the reservation and cut the timber and haul it out unsawed, or whether it might be sawed on the reservation. There are some cases where they have sawmills where they admit the big lumbermen who purchase the timber from the Government. They enable them to erect temporary sawmills there. It may be that a homesteader, a farmer, in the neighborhood will go in there and say, "I want certain timber for my domestic use on my little farm for fuel, for fencing, for a stable, a cabin, or for a house," and it is a matter of negotiation between him and the department whether he will take it there or the department will deliver it to him outside of the boundary of the reservation. You can not lay down any hard and fast rule. What would be proper in one case might not be proper in another.

Mr. JONES. Would the amendment permit the forest officers to sell lumber to a local sawmill for purely local and domestic purposes?

Mr. NELSON. It would not permit them to sell it to the sawmill, if the sawmill was speculating. It would permit a farmer to buy it and have it delivered at the local sawmill for his own use.

Mr. JONES. Of course. Then I do not see what the actual cost would be.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator on reflection ought to know that if in one case the Secretary permits the farmer to go in there and cut logs and haul them away the cost would be trifling. If the logs are taken outside and sawed, or suppose they are sawed by the Government either outside or on the edge of the reservation, and the farmer comes there and buys the lumber that is sawed, of course the cost would be higher. It all depends upon the manner in which the farmer acquires the logs or the timber and the manner in which the Secretary sells it.

Mr. JONES. But the Government is not running any sawmill? We do not expect to do that?

Mr. NELSON. They are, indirectly. They are selling the timber there and allowing them to saw it on the reserve in some cases.

Mr. JONES. I know that, but I want it so that the farmer can get that timber. I just want to get at the scope of the amendment. I do not understand that the Government will cut logs and take them outside.

Mr. NELSON. It is not necessary at all. They can pick out the logs or timber and say to the farmer, "Come and get it and haul it out."

Mr. JONES. That is what I think ought to be done.

Mr. NELSON. I have no doubt that is what they will do, but at all events you can not lay down a hard and fast rule. It is a matter that will have to be determined by regulations in each particular case.

Mr. JONES. But under what rule will the department determine the cost to the farmer?

Mr. NELSON. What rule would the Senator determine if he had charge of a reserve?

Mr. JONES. When I was ready I would let the man go in and get logs and haul them out himself.

Mr. NELSON. I ask the Senator what rule can be laid down in law? Can the Senator conceive of any rule we can lay down in law for determining the price?

Mr. JONES. I would not fix any price in that case. I would say, let the farmer go in and take it out under rules and regulations, without cost, except to himself. What I want to get at is——

Mr. NELSON. We leave it to the Secretary to fix the price, but it must be the actual cost price.

Mr. JONES. When there is not any cost there will be no charge unless they pay administration charges.

Mr. NELSON. There may be something in that. Whatever it may be, it is the actual cost.

Mr. JONES. I want to get for the RECORD just what is intended, because I am heartily in favor of the purpose of the Senator's amendment, and I think it ought to be made just as liberal as possible for the local settler.

Mr. NELSON. I do not think it is necessary in these cases to give it away absolutely, but when the farmer or homesteader who can go there and get timber and logs for his fences, for his stable, for his cabin, whatever slight cost the Government may have been to in the premises, he ought to be willing to pay, and it will be a moderate cost. At present that timber is sold in competition. It is sold at the same rate as the big lumbermen charge.

Mr. JONES. That ought not to be.

Mr. NELSON. And that ought not be. At all events, it ought not to be as against this class of people. As against people who speculate and deal in lumber, that is a different question, but this does not cover that. I use the word "domestic," however, and I think there can be no question as to the fair and reasonable meaning of that word. I have made it general; and it is always a good principle in law to deal in comprehensive general terms, like our Constitution of the United States, instead of going into details. If you go into details very much you are apt to run up against the old law rule, expressio unius est exclusio alterius.

Mr. JONES. I wish to ask the Senator a question. I want to understand it. Does the Senator understand that, under his amendment, a settler could not be refused the right to purchase saw logs or timber, on the ground that he has no way himself to work it up into lumber?

Mr. NELSON. No.

Mr. JONES. If he wants it for his own use and expects to take it down to the lumber mill and have it sawed up?

Mr. NELSON. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. JONES. That is what I wanted to have made plain.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I had some doubt as to the propriety of this amendment until the Senator from Minnesota quoted the Latin axiom so felicitously; but I am inclined to think now that it is all right. I will ask the Senator if it might not be well to insert, after "the Secretary of Agriculture," the words "under such rules and regulations as he shall establish"?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. That will be implied, anyway, but I am afraid the Senator has called out my amiable friend from Idaho, when he proposes to insert those words. I wish the Senator would withdraw it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the words had better go in. It is the usual form. I ask the Secretary to report the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the proposed modification of the amendment.

The SECRETARY. After the words "Secretary of Agriculture" insert the words "under such rules and regulations as he shall establish."

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I am going to take some risk in disappointing the Senator. I did not rise for the purpose of objecting to that, but I am inclined to think that the suggestion should go in the RECORD that this is in the nature of legislative competition with local business interests.

All around forest reserves you find towns and villages that are looking over the fence with envy because they are kept out. In all those towns you will find lumber yards, where men have invested money in mills for the manufacture of lumber with the view of selling it to the settlers when they come along to make their fences and to build their houses. Now, what are you going to say to the people within hauling distance, and I would say that might be said to be 30 or 40 miles? A man is going to build a barn, what we call in our country a good barn, which would cost, say, $4,000, and a house which would cost as much more. There would be $8,000, and one-half of it is lumber. One-half of every building of that kind is lumber and the other half is labor. Of course, he might be worth a million or he might be worth one hundred dollars. He would take advantage of this free lumber, and the better off he was the more apt he would be to do it, because he would own his team, and he would say, "Go up into the forest reserve and bring down the necessary lumber to build this house and barn and fence in this tract of land." The fences on that land would be worth $2.50 an acre. He would probably have to have a great deal of that sawed out at the local mill, but the sawmill might be entirely disassociated from the lumber yard, or there might be no sawmill there. He might get what we call a portable sawmill, which is rather easily procured and is not expensive at all. Many farmers maintain them on their places for general use. So he would run around the man who was attempting to establish and build up a business there. That man would not be within the scope of the generosity of this act.

He would have to either buy his lumber, at the prices that have been referred to, of the Forestry Service, and then compete with the man who got it for nothing, or would have to buy it somewhere else; but, in any event, he would have the cost of the manufacture on his hands.

I want to be just as generous to the settler as possible. I would be more generous and let him go in and build his house and barn and fences where the timber grew. Timber grows on rich soil; the richest soil we have is covered with timber, and very often with no more timber than is necessary to equip and maintain the equipment of a farm, but still it is covered with timber.

I have some doubt about this generosity. It sounds plausible, but it would be at the expense of the prosperity of the business men—that is, those who engage in the lumber business and all that pertains to it and sustains it. You would put a certain class of men at an advantage over those business interests. Everything that sounds generous and plausible is not necessarily fair in the distribution of the benefits of government. It is a very nice arrangement for the settler who is within hauling distance, but there is no limitation here. It might be that he would bring it down, put it on a railroad, and take it 200 miles away to build his house. If I were going to build a house over in Latah County somewhere, and I wanted to get free lumber, I would take advantage of this act, get the lumber out, put it on a railroad at one of these many stations, and haul it to the place of use.

It does not follow that the settler would have to haul it in a wagon or snake it with a horse, or anything of that kind. Men might start in to build a great many houses, as they do in those new towns. I have known a town there to grow from nothing to four or five thousand inhabitants in two years. Those people are not close to any forest reserve that has timber on it, but they are close to several forest reserves that have sagebrush on them. They would go over into the Sawtooth, say, which would be 50, 60, or 70 miles away; they would put the lumber on the railroad up there—there is a railroad that runs into that country—and they would run it into the city that I speak of. There is no provision in this amendment that would prevent them doing that. They would have it delivered to them either at the place where it was cut or at the edge of the reservation and haul it away. The enterprise that I speak of would take about 18,000 feet of lumber, or perhaps 20,000, to construct buildings, and 5,000 feet more for fences and incidental improvements. So he would get twenty or thirty thousand feet of lumber off a forest reserve 60 miles away, and he would have only the railroad freight to where he wanted to use it.

I would merely suggest that you pause long enough to inspect this amendment and see whether or not you are really going to benefit the neighborhood where the lumber is to be obtained.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I am in general accord with the Senator from Idaho in regard to the forest-reserve proposition, but on this particular branch of it we are about as far apart as the poles. I should like to see this amendment changed; I should like to see it liberalized; I should like to see it changed to such form that the farmer, the settler, or the homesteader in the vicinity of a reserve needing dead, down, or matured timber for domestic purposes, and the Government having on that forest reservation dead, down, and matured timber which, in the interest of conservation, ought to be removed and used—I should like to have the Government say to that man, "Come and get it free of cost."

Mr. HEYBURN. So should I.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That is exactly my view of it. Having that view of it, I move to strike from the amendment——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. With pleasure.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator from Wyoming a question. We might furnish this lumber, it seems to me, free of cost to the man who got it, but could we furnish it free of cost? Here are all the people of the country paying for the rangers, guards, supervisors, and heaven knows what, and it seems to me it is much better that the lumber should be furnished to the man free of cost to the people of the United States than it is to furnish it free of cost to him.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator from Mississippi forgets, however, that so long as this dead and down timber is there——

Mr. WILLIAMS. This does not confine itself to dead and down timber.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. And matured timber which ought to be cut——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That that remaining upon the ground is a continual source of expense to the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That would be very true if the amendment simply said "dead and down timber," but it does not. It gives men a right to get perfectly sound timber which is good for building purposes, and they certainly ought to pay for that. So far as the dead and down timber is concerned, that is good for nothing except to burn, and it would be a benefit to the forest reserves to have it hauled away; but it seems to me that there is nothing in the amendment which would prevent a man in a village or a town near there from getting his lumber free, if your idea were carried out—that is, free to him—but he would not get it free to me or to the remainder of the people of the United States, who are paying taxes to keep up this thing. I think it would be better to leave it as the Senator from Minnesota has left it—"at cost."

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am perfectly willing to leave it that way, and shall perhaps not press my amendment; but I want to say to the Senator from Mississippi that his logic is exceedingly faulty, for the reason that the dead and down timber and the mature timber is a continual source of expense to the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, how can the mature timber, which has been sold as the Senator from Minnesota has just told us at Weyerhaueser trust prices, be an expense? It is a source of profit.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. But, of course, the Senator——

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is enough to ask of the United States that they shall forego their profit upon the timber that they might otherwise sell. To go further and ask them to forego, not only the profit that they might make upon it, but all that they have expended in taking care of it, it seems to me is going a little too far.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, of course the position which the Senator from Mississippi takes and the position which I take are absolutely irreconcilable. He and I can never get together, nor can I ever get together with any other man on the proposition that the Government of the United States has a constitutional right to sell timber for profit. We never can get together on that proposition; but, Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I decline to yield for the present.

But, Mr. President, I do not want to jeopardize the amendment; I want to make it freer; I want to make it so that if a man wants to build a corral, a barn, a house, or a cabin upon his claim—the Government of the United States having hundreds of thousands of feet of lumber lying dead and down and mature, which is often a menace to the forest proposition—that the Government shall give that man the right to have it free of charge. I will move an amendment, which has been suggested by the Senator from Idaho beside me [Mr. BORAH], that instead of using the word "cost" in the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota to substitute the word "expense."

Mr. HEYBURN. That is good.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator from Wyoming has concluded, I wish to say that I do not suppose, of course, that he intends to make me say something which I have not said.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Oh, no.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have expressed no opposition to the amendment introduced by the Senator from Minnesota, nor have I expressed any desire that the Government of the United States should make a profit out of its citizens in connection with the public lands. What I have said is that it would be highly unjust that the Government should give away valuable timber to anybody. That is a totally different thing from making a profit out of it. I think the Senator from Minnesota has struck the middle way—which, as Horace says, is the best way—when he says that the Government shall let those people have this timber at the cost which it has been to the Government.

There is no difference that I can see between "expense" and "cost" unless it be the difference betwixt tweedledum and tweedledee. If the word "expense" is to be substituted for "cost," then you will have to go back and ask what real expense has been incurred by the Government in connection with this particular transaction; and when you have made an inquiry upon that subject and have obtained an answer your answer is the cost to the Government of the lumber.

Of course it is absolutely impossible for the Government to run back and keep an account for all time to determine what a particular piece of timber cost the Government. It might have to be merely approximated; there might be some forest reservations so expensively carried on that if the Government included all the charges the lumber would be worth $100 a cord; and from some of the criticisms of the manner in which this business has been handled in the West I think that that probably would be true. I am in favor of letting the people use the logs on the forest reservations, utilize the timber and everything else utilizable about them, but I am not in favor of taxing the entire people of the United States in order to furnish a few of them free of charge with something which otherwise they would have to pay a good round price for.

There is no difference that I can see between the position taken by the Senator from Minnesota and the position which I have taken. I am merely protesting against the idea of not charging anything for that which is costing a good deal; I am merely suggesting the idea that the Senator could not, if he wanted to, furnish this lumber to the settlers free of cost. He could furnish it free of cost to the settler, but it is already not free of cost to us.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The expression was not "free of cost," I will say to the Senator.

Now, Mr. President, the very reason that I suggested a change in the wording of the amendment——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not think there will be any objection to the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I was going to say, if the Senator will be patient a moment, that I withdraw the first amendment I have proposed, because I see there is no disposition to allow a man to drive his wagon into a great forest and, without paying this great Government of the United States for value received, cut a load of timber or a load of logs. Therefore, I withdraw my suggestion that the settler ought to have it for nothing, because it is a part, as I see in the view of some, of this great domain that we are going to exploit for the financial benefit of the Government.

But the difference between the second amendment which I have proposed and the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota, the difference between the word "cost" and the word "expense," is shown by what the Senator says. If the word "cost" is left in, if the timber be furnished at cost, I am fearful that the cost will be along the line the Senator from Mississippi has suggested; it might run up as high as it is at the present time. I do not suppose that any of the timber that is now sold by the Government is sold for less than cost, if you consider the entire running expenses of the reserve. Therefore, I wanted to substitute the word "expense," I am perfectly frank to say, wishing that the word "expense" should mean nothing except the expense to the Government in getting out the particular timber or lumber.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then, the Senator means by that——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. But, there being objection to that, I withdraw my proposed amendment, and shall vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, a word more, because I do not want anybody to think that I am trying to put upon him a rule which would be unjust. There are public lands in the State of Mississippi as well as in Wyoming. A man who goes in upon them for the purpose of cutting a tree and who cuts it and carries it out is prosecuted and sent to prison by the United States Government. So the rule about which I am talking is not peculiar at all. I do not see any reason why people should not be permitted to go upon public lands anywhere and cut timber at cost; but, notwithstanding the fact that this amendment confines this privilege to forest reserves and does not extend it to the people upon public lands in Mississippi and Alabama, I am perfectly willing to vote for it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I merely want to suggest in all seriousness that there is no limitation as to the distance from the reserve to the place where the lumber may be taken. You can, under this provision, get lumber from a forest reserve and carry it through a dozen cities and towns where they have lumber yards, commercial establishments; you can carry it beyond those cities and towns and build your house. You are giving an opportunity for a class of competition and advantage in business that ought not to be passed without notice. The Senate will doubtless adopt this amendment, but I should like it to be noticed in the RECORD that it is subject to these objections. You could get lumber from a forest reserve that surrounds the city where I live—the city of Wallace—take it a hundred miles, and pass through 12 commercial lumber yards. You could take it down to a town where a lumber yard has been built up with a view of supplying settlers who could pay for it.

Now, you can not very well in legislation recognize the degree of poverty that shall entitle a man to a blessing of this kind, and you can not in legislation say that a rich man may not take advantage of it. There will be some embarrassment grow out of it if it is adopted, as it doubtless will be; and I shall watch with considerable interest the report that comes to us a year or two years from now as to the use that is made of this amendment. There will be protests—of course they will be of no avail after we have enacted the law—but men with capital invested in business establishments there will object to it, and they have a right to be heard.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, on yesterday I gave notice that I would offer an amendment. I have nothing further to say upon the subject. I am aware that a point of order might be made against the amendment, but I hope that it will not be made and that the Senator in charge of the bill will allow a vote to be taken upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 52, after line 14, it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided further, That the management, supervision, and administration of the respective forest reserves within the State of New Mexico and of that portion of any such reserve partly within said State shall, subject to all the laws of the United States and of the general rules and regulations heretofore adopted by the Agricultural Department, be devolved upon the State government and officers of the State of New Mexico. The Legislature of New Mexico shall, if the provisions hereof are accepted by a resolution of such body, provide the necessary officers and employees for the care, management, and administration of each of such reserves or parts of reserves. The salary and expense accounts of such officers and employees and all expenses of such care, management, and administration, including reforestation, shall be paid wholly out of the funds derived from the lease of lands and grazing permits, sale of timber, and other sources of revenue from such forest reserves, and no part of any such or any other expense connected with the care, management, or administration of such reserves shall be paid out of the appropriations herein made or by the United States out of any other funds, and any funds remaining after the payment of all expenses as in the proviso set out, shall be paid into the treasury of New Mexico to be expended as provided by the State laws.

The Secretary of Agriculture shall have the power and he is hereby directed to cause such reserves to be inspected from time to time and shall see that all laws and rules applicable to such reserves are enforced, and shall have the power to suspend any State official or employee failing to enforce such laws and rules and regulations, pending a hearing upon charges to be made by him under his direction to the governor of New Mexico, who shall promptly remove and appoint a successor to any such official or employee against whom such charges are sustained.

Mr. BURNHAM. Mr. President, as that amendment is evidently a proposition involving general legislation on an appropriation bill, I must make the point of order against it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the provision with reference to renovated-butter establishments, on page 14.

Mr. BURNHAM. I ask what disposition was made of the point of order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order has been entered, and debate is in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am now directing attention to an amendment that was adopted, on page 14.

Mr. WARREN (to Mr. HEYBURN). The point of order has not been ruled upon.

Mr. HEYBURN. I thought the Chair had decided the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has not. The Chair was about to ask the Senator from New Mexico if he desired to be heard on the point of order. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. FALL. No, Mr. President; I do not think I care to be heard any further, except to say that there is a change proposed in the selection of the officials of the forest reserves in New Mexico, and that is the only change. At the present time they are selected by the Secretary of Agriculture. The amendment simply proposes that they shall be selected by the officials of New Mexico.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire to call attention to the amendment on page 14 which refers to establishments making renovated butter, and I ask the chairman of the committee whether or not the words "renovated butter" are intended to cover all oleomargarine establishments?

Mr. BURNHAM. I do not understand that that is the meaning of it. I understand it to apply to the butter that is brought together in a renovator.

Mr. HEYBURN. Would it not be well to include in the amendment the other establishments?

Mr. BURNHAM. That has not been brought to the attention of the committee.

Mr. HEYBURN. I move to insert after the word "renovated" the words "or artificial butter or oleomargarine."

I think there is no reason for excepting one class of establishments and including the others.

Mr. BURNHAM. I am not informed in regard to that, and therefore I can not accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho offers an amendment to the amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 14, line 9, after the words "renovated butter," insert "or artificial butter or oleomargarine."

Mr. HEYBURN. It seems obvious that in providing for the inspection of renovated butter we should include all that class of products. There is no reason why we should include one and except the other.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to ask the Senator in charge of the bill whether there is not already a law—the oleomargarine law—providing for the inspection of places where oleomargarine is made?

Mr. HEYBURN. No.

Mr. BURNHAM. I do not understand the Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does not the existing oleomargarine law provide for the inspection of buildings where oleomargarine is made?

Mr. BURNHAM. I have that impression, although I am not sure.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think the Senator will not find it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I suggest to the Senator that without intending to do it he may repeal some statute on the statute books.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not think there is any law requiring the inspection of the buildings, but merely of the process.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think if he will look into the law he will find there is, because when the United States undertook to tax it they took hold of the taxing power really as a means of inspecting.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would call the attention of the Senator to the difference between inspecting the product and inspecting the premises where the product is made.

Mr. BURNHAM. I know of two reasons for the amendment. One is to provide for an inspection with regard to the sanitary condition of the buildings and the other is to enable the Government to inspect the process of manufacture before it is completed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Idaho.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 62, line 10, strike out "eighty-five" and insert "ninety"; in line 11 strike out "ten" and insert "fifteen"; and at the end of line 12 insert:

Five thousand dollars, of which sum, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be applied to the investigation of insects affecting the alfalfa plant in the Salt River Valley, Arizona.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That raises the appropriation only $5,000, and I have a resolution from the chamber of commerce which I will not trouble the Senate to have read, and also letters from the owners of great fields of alfalfa that tell of a fear of the invasion of an insect that is just now getting into the fields, which is very dangerous to them. It strikes me that it is very necessary that this money should be appropriated for that purpose as early as possible. Inasmuch as I have made no other request in connection with this bill, I should be glad to have the amendment adopted.

Mr. BURNHAM. As far as I have any authority I accept the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FALL. I desire to offer an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 14, after line 16, insert:

For necessary expenses in establishing and maintaining the breeding station for western saddle horses in New Mexico in cooperation with the College of Agriculture and Mechanic Arts, $25,000.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, it seems that the President of the United States has just withdrawn in Dona Ana County, N. Mex., near which the College of Agriculture and Mechanic Arts is located, 200,000 acres of the public domain for a horse-breeding experiment station for the breeding of western saddle horses. There is a Government horse-breeding station in Colorado for the breeding of American carriage horses. The Government, as I understand, has been contemplating the establishment of a similar station for experimenting and breeding the western saddle horses for Cavalry purposes. It appears that this land has been withdrawn for these purposes. I can say that neither of the Senators from New Mexico had any knowledge that any such action was contemplated at this time; and I am only to-day in receipt of a telegram informing me that this action has been taken, the information coming from New Mexico. It appears, however, to be official. Mr. Hayes and I believe the president of the agricultural college has agreed that they should have $25,000 to start this breeding station. Certainly, if the Government is going to withdraw the land from entry and reserve it for some purpose, then something should be done with it. The land has been withdrawn.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I thought perhaps the Senator in charge of the bill would make a point of order. I believe the time has arrived when we should stop and inquire how far the Government of the United States is going to go. It seems now that we are to go into the horse-breeding business. The United States is full of people who are breeding horses. The Government is not needed in that business. There is nothing brand new about it.

After it goes into the horse-breeding business, I suppose it will go into the cow-breeding business, and after that perhaps the sheep and goat breeding business. It has already been suggested that we should go into the buffalo business. It seems to me it is about time to draw the line somewhere. It seems to me we might leave farming to the farmer.

As far as the Agricultural Department is concerned, as I understand, its functions consist in teaching how to farm and to some extent in carrying on experimental and demonstration farming for the purpose of teaching. But there is no teaching involved in going into the business of breeding horses or breeding cattle. Everything the teacher can teach on that subject can be taught by books and bulletins. It is not like introducing a new plant into a new territory and experimenting with it and reporting the results of the experiment. It does seem to me that we ought to stop somewhere, and this is a right good place to stop. Before we go into the question of stock and cattle raising business, it does seem to me we might pause and reflect. We might take from this Congress until about the next in pausing and reflecting. Sure I am if we go into it once there will never be any end of it.

I hope the amendment will not be accepted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Mexico.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. On page 89, after line 13, I move to insert what I send to the desk.

I will state to the Senate that this measure has already passed the Senate, and it is for the purpose of expediting the department in carrying on the exposition provided for in the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 89, after line 13, it is proposed to insert the following:

That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he hereby is, empowered to prepare from the several divisions of the Department of Agriculture an exhibit to be displayed at the Fifth National Corn Exposition, to be held in Columbia, S. C., from January 27 to February 9, 1913.

SEC. 2. That the said exhibit shall be of such nature as the Secretary of Agriculture deems appropriate: Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture shall make such arrangements with the proper officers of the said exposition that the Department of Agriculture shall be at no expense for transportation of said exhibit to and from the exposition: Provided further, That the Secretary of Agriculture shall also make such arrangements with the proper authorities of said exposition that there shall be no expense to the department for any breakage or damage that may occur to the exhibit, nor for the living expenses of such appointees as he may see fit to send to said exposition to demonstrate the exhibit sent.

Mr. BURNHAM. As I understand this measure has already passed the Senate; it does not call for any appropriation; and I accept it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

MEMORIAL TO MAJ. BUTT AND MR. MILLET.

Mr. BACON. I ask leave out of order to introduce a joint resolution, which I ask may be read and referred to the Committee on the Library.

I will state, in order that it may not be misunderstood, that it is a joint resolution authorizing the erection upon the public grounds in the city of Washington of a joint memorial to the late Maj. Archibald W. Butt and Mr. Francis Davis Millet. It is one which does not propose that the Government shall be put to any expense at all. The memorial will be erected by friends of these departed gentlemen, and the only authority asked is that it may be placed upon some point to be selected in the public grounds other than the Capitol Grounds, the White House, and the Library, which are excluded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be read as requested.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 108) authorizing the erection on the public grounds in the city of Washington of a joint memorial to Maj. Archibald W. Butt and Francis Davis Millet was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to grant permission for the erection on public grounds of the United States in the city of Washington other than those of the Capitol, the Library of Congress, and the White House, of a joint memorial of simple and artistic form to Maj. Archibald W. Butt, United States Army, and Mr. Francis Davis Millet, vice chairman of the Commission of Fine Arts, officers of the United States who perished in the Titanic disaster: Provided, That the site chosen and the design of the memorial shall be approved by the President of the United States upon the advice of the Commission of Fine Arts, and that the United States shall be put to no expense in or by the erection of the said memorial.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. BACON subsequently said: It has been suggested to me by Senators that a reference of the joint resolution is probably not necessary, as there is no expense involved, and I will ask the Senate to agree to the immediate consideration of the joint resolution. It is upon that suggestion that I make the request.

Mr. BORAH. I hope the Senator from Georgia will let the joint resolution go to the committee. I may be entirely in error in regard to this matter, but I do not know why we should select out of that heroic group of men and women, all of whom displayed such wonderful courage, these particular parties upon whom to confer this indirect if not direct honor. I do not know that I caught the exact import of the resolution, but I should like any action Congress takes to be in recognition not of an individual but of the courage and self-surrender of all who disclosed such sublime poise and such lofty bearing in the presence of disaster and death.

Mr. BACON. I will say to the Senator that there is no purpose in this to exclude the friends of any other parties from making a similar request if they shall see fit to do so. This is simply a movement on the part of certain friends, at their own expense, to erect a memorial. It will probably be in the nature of a fountain, with perhaps some ornamentation in the way of a figure. As I said, it is to be erected at their own expense, and the only request is that it may be put on public grounds somewhere in the city of Washington, excluding from that request the Capitol Grounds, the White House Grounds, and the Library.

I have no doubt, Mr. President, that there will be other movements looking to the erection of memorials to others, either jointly or separately, who were lost in that great disaster, but this certainly does not make any invidious distinction. It is simply granting to the friends of these particular parties the opportunity to utilize a small space upon the public grounds—of which there is a vast expanse—and that it shall be done without any expense to the Government. There is a movement, I am told, by the good ladies of this town to erect a memorial of a more general character to all of the unfortunate parties, or particular groups of them, and I have no doubt that we will be willing that that shall be done.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I would not want to be understood for a moment as making the suggestion which I made by reason of any criticism that might be implied of these two individuals. I recognize that they did that which was calculated to call forth the admiration and the profound pride of not only their friends, but of everyone. But there have been so many suggestions in regard to this matter which have been purely individual, I should like to see a monument reared which would speak of the nobility of human nature as it was displayed there upon that ship, not only or alone in honor of the splendid soldier which Maj. Butt proved himself to be, but the nobility of human character which was exhibited upon the part of scores of men and women.

Mr. BACON. Hundreds.

Mr. BORAH. While I am not going to hold this matter up, I want to express my view in a single sentence—that it is the duty of Congress to manifest its admiration and its strong appreciation of that splendid group of men and women as a whole, and that when we permit personal acquaintance to intrude where universal praise and a world's wonder and admiration would pay unstinted homage to nobility of human nature, we are but poorly interpreting that unfortunate affair.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, if this were a proposition that the United States Government should erect this memorial, the suggestions of the Senator from Idaho would be more convincing than they are at present. I suppose that the erection of this memorial at private expense will not in any manner interfere with the subsequent erection of a more costly and elaborate one, which shall commemorate the heroism and devotion of all those who lost their lives in that deplorable disaster.

I can see no possible foundation for the suggestion that there is anything invidious in it. When there has been a monument erected to a prominent military officer there has been no suggestion that that was an invidious distinction as against all other officers. As time went along the statues of other officers were erected. We have one out in front of the Capitol here which is of a more general character.

I understand, as I have said, that the ladies of this town are now engaged in the collection of a fund with a view to a general memorial, and possibly there may be some particular classes of those who suffered and died there who may have their heroism memorialized in another way.

I wish to suggest to the Senator, to show the peculiar propriety of this measure, that Maj. Butts and Mr. Millet were the only two on that ship who bore the commissions of the United States. Maj. Butt bore a military commission and Mr. Millet a civil commission. This is simply an effort on the part of their friends to erect in the Capital a modest but tasteful memorial, which shall be gratifying to all those who loved them and shall be an encouragement to all those who will wish in the future to emulate their heroism and their devotion on that trying occasion.

Mr. HEYBURN. May I ask the Senator a question? My attention was occupied and I was unable to hear the resolution. The monument is to be contributed, I understand, by private parties.

Mr. BACON. Exclusively so.

Mr. HEYBURN. And where is it to be?

Mr. BACON. On some point upon the public grounds of the capital found in the city of Washington, which may be selected by the Chief of Engineers, but the Capitol Grounds are excluded, the Library is excluded, and the White House Grounds are excluded.

Mr. HEYBURN. It merely occurred to me, and I would suggest, that the rank and relation of those men would recommend them to the consideration of a monument or memorial to be paid for out of the Public Treasury.

Mr. BACON. We are not asking for that. This is an absolutely private testimonial, in which it is expressly stipulated not only that the monument shall be constructed by funds provided by private individuals, but that there shall be no expense of any kind to the Federal Government.

Mr. HEYBURN. I understand. I should like to ask the Senator further whether any of the monuments in the District or city have been constructed by private individuals.

Mr. BACON. Certainly. I will tell the Senator of several. There is the monument to Gen. Albert Pike, which was constructed exclusively by the Masons, of which he was the head of the thirty-third degree, I think.

Mr. HEYBURN. Not the head.

Mr. BACON. I can name a number before I get through, if the Senator will permit me. There is the statue of Martin Luther, which was erected by private individuals.

Mr. HEYBURN. I only ask for information.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, since I started to mention them, there are several others. There is one on the Avenue to Benjamin Franklin, erected by Stilson Hutchins. There is another one near Scott Circle to Daniel Webster, erected by the same man. There is one of Longfellow, on Connecticut Avenue, erected altogether by private subscription. I understand that several of the equestrian statues of military officers of the Civil War have been erected by contributions from their fellow soldiers. There is one, I think, on Seventh Street, near the Avenue, which was erected by the Grand Army of the Republic. I presume there are dozens of them in the city. The different officers have been in that way memorialized by their comrades in the Army, by the Army of the Cumberland, and others. It is a most common thing, and nobody ever suggested when any one of those monuments was about to be erected that there was an invidious distinction as to any other party.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to complete my question. It is whether in each case those statues were erected only by the consent of Congress.

Mr. BACON. Absolutely. It is an impossibility that one should be erected in Washington without it. The only exception I know where there was a statue erected in Washington without the consent of Congress was when the statue of Frederick the Great was put up by an arbitrary Executive order without any consultation with Congress.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to ask the Senator if it is not true that the District government has assumed in one or two cases to erect statues without the consent of Congress?

Mr. BACON. It may be so; but, if so, I am not informed of the fact.

Mr. HEYBURN. It ought not to be so.

Mr. BACON. I am not informed of the fact if it is so.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am in thorough sympathy with the proposition here.

Mr. BACON. There is no authority for the erection of any monument within the District of Columbia or certainly within the city of Washington except on the authority of Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Georgia for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I am very much impressed with the general idea that has been presented here to-night, but it seems to me that this matter ought to go to the committee. It is something new that is brought up; a great many ideas have been entertained by various Senators, and I shall have to object to its present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. BACON. I understand the objection of the Senator from Michigan sends it to the committee?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be the order. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on the Library.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

Mr. BURNHAM submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 5624) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendment.

HENRY E. BURNHAM,
W. O. BRADLEY,
ATLEE POMERENE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JOE J. RUSSELL,
CARL C. ANDERSON,
CHARLES E. FULLER,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the reports of the committees of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the following bills:

H. R. 18335. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war;

H. R. 18337. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war;

H. R. 18954. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war; and

H. R. 18955. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 11 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, May 17, 1912, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 16, 1912.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, we thank Thee that we are created intelligent and industrious beings, that there are always problems to be solved, new fields to be explored, since idleness is a menace to the individual and to the Nation; we must move forward or retrograde. Help us therefore with new zeal and energy to meet the problems which confront us that we may develop our intellectual, moral, and spiritual being and leave the world a little better than we found it. In the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CORRECTION OF PAIRS.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that where my name appears as paired on the Clayton anti-injunction bill on Tuesday, May 14, it may be stricken out of the Journal and the RECORD. I also ask permission to insert two telegrams explanatory of this request. I have standing orders that under no circumstances am I to be paired during my absence without my explicit instructions, because I do not think the pairs made up at the Clerk's desk are proper as showing the Member's attitude. On May 6, 1912, I telegraphed the pair clerk, "Please pair me in favor of the Clayton bill for trial by jury in injunction cases. This is the bill that comes up on Thursday." It was then thought that the bill would come up at that time. I telegraphed my secretary in the same way. The pair clerk being unable to get a live pair for me proceeded to make an ordinary party pair between absentees. On the first vote he paired me with the gentleman from South Carolina, Mr. ELLERBE, and on the second vote with the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. STANLEY. Without a doubt both Mr. ELLERBE and Mr. STANLEY favored the Clayton bill. As I also was in favor of the Clayton bill, the pair made by the pair clerk not only was absurd, but also was contrary to my instructions. If I had been present I should have voted for the Clayton bill and against the substitute.

Therefore I ask that in those two places in the record of the proceedings of May 14, wherever I appear as paired that my name may be stricken out of the list of pairs. I also ask that the telegrams sent to my secretary and to the pair clerk be inserted as showing the true state of affairs.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the corrections as suggested will be made and the telegrams inserted in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The telegrams are as follows:

HAMILTON, MASS., May 6, 1912.

W. W. LUFKIN,
Care Congressman A. P. Gardner, Washington, D. C.:

Please see that I am paired in favor of Clayton bill for trial by jury in injunction cases. HIGGINS, of Connecticut, might pair, or perhaps MCCALL. If necessary consult CLAYTON, but anyway see that the thing is done.

A. P. GARDNER.

HAMILTON, MASS., May 6, 1912.

The PAIR CLERK,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Please pair me in favor of Clayton bill for trial by jury in injunction cases. This is the bill which comes up on Thursday.

A. P. GARDNER.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have a minute or two.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the matter of pairs is not so easy of solution as one might think. The other day when the pension bill was about to be voted upon one of the pair clerks came to me and said that he had a number of requests to be paired in favor of the pension bill, but that he had no one to pair against the pension bill. The question was whether to put in pairs as is usually done, without saying for or against, or whether he should leave the Members unpaired who were absent.

The matter was not free from difficulty. I did not desire to impose the obligation upon the pair clerk of deciding the question, and I said to one of the Republican pair clerks that I would assume the responsibility, and suggested to him that he pair absent Members in the usual way, not being able to secure the pairs that Members desired; and that, if objection was made to it, hereafter we would not be able to pair Members unless the pairs were actually made at the desk.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman if in his opinion the rule touching the matter of pairs ought not to be abolished?

Mr. MANN. I do not think so because I do not believe it would remain abolished very long.

Mr. GARNER. Why not?

Mr. MANN. It is absolutely impossible for many Members of the House to be present upon every roll call, and sometimes it is desirable from their standpoint and from the public standpoint to pair specifically on a bill. On the other hand, it is often very desirable for Members to have what is called a standing pair, a permanent pair, or a pair until further notice, so that Members, if they can not be present at the time, know that they are taken care of by the pair clerk.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I concede that, but, after all, the matter of the pair is an individual matter, and it would not interfere with the making of pairs to abolish the rule.

Mr. MANN. It would interfere with their showing in the RECORD.

Mr. GARRETT. They do not now appear in the Journal.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The only rule is that they shall not be announced more than once on the same legislative day.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, in this case which I have cited there is a very good illustration of the questions brought up by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT]. I have given explicit directions never to be paired in my absence without written authority.

The pairs made up by the pair clerks nowadays mean absolutely nothing. They do not show whether a Member is "for" or "against" a measure. They merely show that one Member of the pair is a Republican and the other a Democrat. The only pair which means anything is a written pair which shows whether a Member is "for" or "against" a measure. That is the kind of pair which I telegraphed for.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, in his own case he has made a very fair statement. The gentleman sent a telegram directing the pair clerk to pair him in a certain way. It was impossible for the pair clerk to comply with that request. It was then up to the pair clerk to determine whether he would pair the gentleman at all, or not, nothing having been said about that in the telegram, and the clerk took the responsibility of pairing the gentleman. That has now been corrected.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. That has been corrected; but I am pointing out the absurdity of pairing a man who was for the bill with two other men who undoubtedly were also for the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I never have had occasion myself to make use of pairs at many times. In my first term in Congress I had a permanent pair with a gentleman on the other side who was called home by illness in his family, and during the entire session of Congress, a long session, I think I never voted at all.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I introduced a resolution in the last Congress and also in this Congress to prohibit the publication of pairs in the RECORD. It does not make any difference how many pairs you make just so long as they are not made public. This whole pair business is a farce from beginning to end, and the publication of a farce serves no public or private good and ought to be abolished.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with the gentleman that it is a farce, but that is a question which is not before the House.

Mr. GARNER and Mr. FOSTER rose.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am quite willing to be under examination.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, under the rule there is really no right to pair a Member unless the pair is signed.

Mr. MANN. I think that is the case.

Mr. FOSTER. And yet, of course, as a matter of convenience, Members are paired when they are absent without the signing of any pair.

Mr. GARNER. It is not a matter of convenience.

Mr. MANN. But if a Member goes to the pair clerk and says to pair him with a certain man, that he has an agreement with him, the Member would be insulted if he were asked by the pair clerk to produce his written agreement.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Illinois will permit an interruption, does he not believe if we did away with the publication of these pairs in the RECORD a good many Members would stay here and be more attentive on the sessions of Congress?

Mr. MANN. No; I do not believe so. On the contrary, I think at the end of every roll call every Member of the House who had a pair would rise and say that he voted so-and-so, that he was in favor of such-and-such a proposition, but that some gentleman with whom he was paired was absent, who, if present, would vote the other way; and instead of having a short statement of pairs as we do now in the RECORD, it would cover a page every time we had a roll call, as it does practically every time they have a roll call in the Senate, where there is a much smaller number of Members than in the House.

Mr. SIMS. It is not necessary to make such a rule.

Mr. MANN. You can not avoid giving that courtesy to Members in some way.

Mr. SIMS. Let them drop the explanations in the box; that is all that is necessary; and not have them read on the floor at all. Let them drop them in the box.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest to the two gentlemen from Tennessee that if they want an authority to back up their position they had better read Thomas Hart Benton's Thirty Year View, where he discusses this whole matter.

Mr. MANN. And he was not able to reform the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Oh, no; nobody can do that. [Laughter and applause.]

EXPLANATION OF A VOTE.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, now that the question of pairs has been raised this morning, I ask the indulgence of the House for a moment.

On the 2d or 3d of May I was granted leave of absence for eight days, but at the same time took the precaution to arrange for a pair, and especially as to pension legislation. I arranged a pair before going away with Representative BATHRICK of Ohio, but for some reason unknown to me the pair was transferred between Representative BATHRICK of Ohio and Representative SISSON of Mississippi. The pair clerk informs me that as both Representative BATHRICK and myself were in favor of the bill he intended to pair me with some one who was against the bill, which he failed to do, and, of course, I did not know about it until my return to the House.

I voted for the pension bill when it passed the House, carrying several more millions than the bill which has been enacted into law, and if I had been here I should have voted for the bill or conference report.

PENSION BILLS.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the conference report on the bill S. 5624.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. 5624. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the statement be read instead of the report.

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman that he ask to have the report read, as it is much shorter.

Mr. RUSSELL. I ask to have the report read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report instead of the statement.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 688).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 5624) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendment.

JOE J. RUSSELL,
CARL C. ANDERSON,
CHARLES E. FULLER,
Managers on the part of the House.

HENRY E. BURNHAM,
W. O. BRADLEY,
ATLEE POMERENE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement is as follows:

STATEMENT.

The bill as it passed the Senate contained a provision to grant an increase of pension to $65 per month to Henry G. Trimble, late of Company C, Third Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Infantry. This item was stricken out by the House and the bill sent to conference. The soldier is drawing a pension of $55 per month under the general law for loss of arm at the shoulder, incurred in line of duty. It appears that he has recently had a stroke of paralysis and is now helpless, and has an aged wife dependent upon him; and while the rate allowed by the Senate is in excess of that usually allowed in such cases, yet in view of all the circumstances of this case your conferees believe they are justified in recommending that the House recede from its amendment and allow the item to remain in the bill, and so recommend.

JOE J. RUSSELL,
CARL C. ANDERSON,
CHARLES E. FULLER,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the conference report be agreed to.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the conference report on House bill 18335.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 18335. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read the report as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 708).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 18335) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 4, 5, and 18.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, and 17, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3 and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter inserted insert "fifty"; and the Senate agree to the same.

JOE J. RUSSELL,
CARL C. ANDERSON,
CHARLES E. FULLER,
Managers on the part of the House.

P. J. MCCUMBER,
HENRY E. BURNHAM,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement is as follows:

STATEMENT.

Amendments Nos. 1, 6, 8, 10, 11, 13, and 15 are amendments made by the Senate to correct the record in accordance with records of Pension Office and to strike out items relating to beneficiaries who have died since the bills passed the House, to all of which the House receded from its disagreement.

Amendment No. 2, the case of Edwin G. Owen, which passed the House at $60 per month: The Senate cut the amount to $50, and the House receded from its disagreement.

Amendment No. 3, the case of Martin H. Black: The House passed the bill at $60 per month. The Senate substituted $36 per month. The soldier had a service of more than three years. He is now disabled and practically helpless. The conferees agreed on the allowance of a rate of $50 per month.

Amendment No. 4, the case of John H. Mohler: The House passed the bill at $30 per month; the Senate reduced it to $24. The Senate recedes from its amendment.

Amendment No. 5, George Smith: The House passed the bill at $30 per month. The Senate cut it to $24. The Senate recedes from its amendment.

Amendment No. 7, Hiram S. Kenyon: The House passed the bill at $20 per month. After the bill was passed evidence was filed with the Senate committee showing that soldier had two services, and the Senate raised the amount to $30 per month. The House recedes from its disagreement.

Amendment No. 9, the case of Bridget McAloon, dependent mother of Peter McAloon: The House passed this bill at $50 per month. She is now receiving $30 under the general law, and the Senate struck the item from the bill. The House recedes from its disagreement.

Amendment, No. 12, John S. Cochrane: The House passed this bill at $30 per month. The Senate cut it out on the grounds that the soldier is now working for the railroad at $1.25 per day, hence he is not wholly disabled. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 14, Ellen M. De Coursey: The House passed this bill at $20 per month. It appears that the widow is getting $12 from the Government of the United States and $12.50 from the city of Boston as the widow of a policeman. The Senate struck the item from the bill on the grounds that she had an income of $24.50 per month, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 16, Stephen D. Smith, dependent father of Franklin Smith: The House passed this at $20 per month. The beneficiary is drawing $12 under the general law, and the Senate struck the item from the bill on the grounds that they have repeatedly refused to grant bills to pension the dependent father of a soldier. The House recedes from its disagreement to this amendment.

Amendment No. 17, Arthur E. Gilligan: The House passed this at $30 per month. Additional evidence filed with the Senate committee is to the effect that the soldier is physically and mentally disabled so as to be helpless as a child and requires the aid and attendance of another person. The Senate increased the amount to $40, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 18, Friedrich Miller: The House passed this bill at $30. The Senate reduced it to $24 on the grounds of short service. Soldier incurred a grievous disability in the service, and the Senate recedes.

JOE J. RUSSELL,
CARL C. ANDERSON,
CHARLES E. FULLER,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the conference report be agreed to.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill 18337.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 18337. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain dependent children of such soldiers and sailors of said war.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 18337) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

The statement is as follows:

STATEMENT.

Amendments Nos. 1, 3, 4, 5, 6, 8, 9, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 21, 24, 25, 26, and 29 are amendments made to correct the record and to strike out items relating to beneficiaries who have died since the bill passed the House. In all of these cases the House recedes from its disagreement.

Amendment No. 2, Alva O. Brooks: The House passed this at $30. The Senate reduced the amount to $24 on the grounds that the soldier was not seriously disabled, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 7, Richard H. Ely: The house passed the bill at $30 per month. The Senate cut it out on the grounds that it was a second special act, the soldier receiving at the present time $24 under an act passed a number of years ago. His physical condition is much worse, and the Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 10, Marion Finley: This item passed the House at $36. The Senate cut it to $24 without the additional evidence on which it was raised to $36 on the floor of the House. It appears that soldier is suffering from a malignant cancer of the face, and the Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 11, William Miller: The House passed this at $24 per month. The Senate cut it out on the grounds that the soldier is receiving $12 from the Government as pension and $21 per month from a railroad. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 19, Robert N. Barton: The House passed this at $24 per month. The Senate cut the item from the bill on the grounds of short service. The soldier incurred disability in the service, and the Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 20, Thomas Addington: The House passed this at $50 per month. The Senate cut it to $36. The soldier is nearly 90 years of age and had a long service, and the Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 22, Francis J. Truesdale: The House passed this at $30 per month. It appears that the soldier is getting a salary of $80 a month at the present time, and therefore the Senate cut the item from the bill. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 23, John Williams: The House passed this at $30. The Senate cut it to $24 on the grounds of short service. Soldier is disabled, and the Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 27, John J. James: The House passed this bill at $36 per month. The Senate cut it out on the grounds of its being a second special act. The soldier's condition is much worse than at the time the first act was passed, and the Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 28, Pulaski T. Gaither: The House passed this bill at $30 per month. The Senate cut it to $24 on account of short service. The Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 30, Joseph Butcher: The House passed this at $30. The Senate cut it to $24 on the grounds of the soldier not being wholly disabled. His condition is serious, and the Senate recedes.

JOE J. RUSSELL,
CARL C. ANDERSON,
CHARLES E. FULLER,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the conference report be agreed to.

HENRY E. BURNHAM,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement is as follows:

STATEMENT.

Amendments Nos. 2, 6, 8, 10, 11, and 14 are merely amendments to correct the bill or to strike out the names of certain beneficiaries who have died since the bill passed the House, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 1, Joseph L. Day: The House passed this at $30 per month. The Senate cut the amount to $24 on the grounds that soldier had a very short service and was not disabled by reason of that service. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 3, Levi Taylor: The House passed this at $36 per month. The Senate cut the amount to $24 on account of short service. Soldier incurred disability in the service, and the Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 4, Mary E. Hitchcock: The House passed this at $20. The beneficiary is drawing $12, and the Senate cut the item out on the grounds that she did not marry the soldier until 1883 and is not seriously disabled. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 5, James P. Nesbit: The House passed this at $30. The Senate cut it to $24 on the grounds of short service and soldier not receiving any disability by reason of such service. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 7, Jacob Guy: The House passed this at $36. The Senate cut it to $30 on account of short service, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 9, Mary Fox, dependent mother: The House passed this at $20, giving an increase of $8. The Senate cut the item out on the ground that it was adverse to granting increases to dependent relatives. The beneficiary is 86 years old, and the Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 12, Edward D. Bliss, dependent father of soldier: The House passed this at $20, giving an increase of $8. The Senate cut it out on the grounds that he is not seriously disabled or very old. The House recedes. The beneficiary is pensioned as the father of a Spanish War soldier, and the bill really belonged to the Committee on Pensions.

Amendment No. 13, Jerome S. Pinney: The House passed this at $30. The Senate cut the item out on the grounds that the soldier had a very short service and is receiving a salary of $300 or $400 per year and an annuity of $60 in addition to his pension of $12. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 15, William Dodds: The House passed this at $30. The Senate cut it to $24 on account of short service at the close of the war, and the House recedes.

The statement is as follows:

STATEMENT.

Amendments Nos. 1, 4, 6, 12, 18, 22, 25, 27, 29, 31, and 32 are merely corrections and cutting out items relating to beneficiaries who have died since the bill passed the House. The House recedes from all of these.

Amendment No. 2, Lewis B. Rex: The House passed this at $36. The Senate cut it to $30 on the grounds that soldier was not seriously disabled. He is a very old man, and the Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 3, Wilson F. Ball: The House passed this bill at $36. The Senate cut it to $30 on the grounds that the soldier had some income in addition to his pension. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 5, John S. Ponce: The House passed this at $20. The soldier was wounded in service, and the Senate raised it to $24. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 7, Judson B. Lupton: The House passed this at $36. The Senate cut it to $30. The soldier is an old man and had good service. The Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 8, Mary M. Heistler: The House passed this bill at $12 per month. The Senate cut it out on the grounds that she was a remarried widow. She was the wife of the soldier during his service, and the Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 9, Samuel E. Johnson: The House passed this at $30. The Senate cut it to $24 on the grounds that the soldier is not seriously disabled. The soldier had good service, and the Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 10, Nelson F. Abrams: The House passed this at $30. The Senate cut it to $24 on the grounds that the soldier was not seriously disabled, being rated at only $10 in his last examination. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 11, Hosea B. Brooks: The House passed this at $24. The soldier had a very short service at the close of the war and is getting $15 per month. The Senate cut the item from the bill. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 13, George R. Scott: The House passed this at $50. The Senate cut it from the bill on the grounds of its being a second special act. It appears that he is totally helpless, and the Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 14, Michael Holland: The House passed this at $30 per month. The Senate cut the item out on the grounds of his receiving $1,000 from the Government per year. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 15, John Bunting: The House passed this at $36 per month. The Senate cut it to $30 on the grounds that he did not require aid and assistance. It appears that the soldier is nearly blind and had more than three years' service. The Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 16, Adam Wolf: The House passed this at $30. The Senate cut it to $24 on the grounds that the soldier was not in a particularly bad physical conidtion. He had a long service, and the Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 17, Joseph H. Kirby: The House passed this at $36. The Senate cut it to $30 on the grounds that the service was at the close of the war and soldier's disabilities do not confine him to his home. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 19, Merlin L. Kirby: The House passed this at $20. The Senate raised it to $24. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 20, Dora Stevens: The House passed this at $12. The soldier's death was not due to service. The widow did not marry him until 1895, and the Senate cut the item from the bill. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 21, Robert Schumann: The House passed this at $30. The Senate cut it to $24 on the grounds that the soldier has some income and is not seriously disabled. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 23, Phillip Main: The House passed this at $30. The Senate cut it to $24 on the grounds that the service was short, soldier having served only about four months. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 24, Sarah Ann Williamson: The House passed this at $20 on account of helpless child. The Senate raised it to $24, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 25, Darius Cook: The House passed this at $30. The Senate cut it to $24 on the grounds that soldier only served three months. House recedes.

Amendment No. 28, George S. Bristol: The House passed this at $36. The Senate cut it to $20 on the grounds of short service. The soldier received disability in the service, and the Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 30, John W. Arthur: The House passed this at $12. The Senate cut it out on the grounds that the soldier served only 61 days. The House recedes.

JOE J. RUSSELL,
CARL C. ANDERSON,
CHARLES E. FULLER,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the conference report be agreed to.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

PRINTING OF REMARKS OF MAURICE SIMMONS.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a patriotic speech delivered by Mr. Maurice Simmons, of New York.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not understand the gentleman.

Mr. DYER. I desire to insert in the RECORD a patriotic address delivered by Maurice Simmons, of New York. I desire to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting that address.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this will take the same course as those of yesterday?

Mr. DYER. Yes; be printed at the close of the proceedings of the House.

Mr. MANN. A course which was not taken by the speech inserted by the gentleman on yesterday.

Mr. RAKER. That is the reason I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that I called the Reporter's attention to it, and I notice it was not at the back of the RECORD, and I wanted to take occasion this morning, so far as it was concerned, to have it put in the back of the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. Yesterday morning it was said that the Members who had speeches of this kind should put them in the rear of the RECORD, having them marked, "Print this at the end of the proceedings."

Mr. BOEHNE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to serve notice now that I am going to object to any future insertions of speeches of this character.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] to print the speech he has referred to in the RECORD? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

PENSION BILLS.

Mr. HAMLIN rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] rise?

Mr. HAMLIN. I wish to call to the attention of the Chair that he has not yet announced the vote on the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks he did. The reading clerk——

Mr. HAMLIN. My colleague from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] interrupted the Chair and the Chair did not announce the vote.

The SPEAKER. The vote agreeing to the conference report carried. By a special agreement the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] is recognized.

PANAMA CANAL.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 21969, designated and known as the Panama Canal bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, pending that motion I would like to confer with the other side as to any agreement they may desire to make in regard to debate. I have only one suggestion myself, and that is that whatever general debate there is be limited to the subject under consideration and divided equally between those who favor and those who oppose the bill.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to have any agreement as to the length of the debate?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes, sir. I would like to hear from the other side.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. Speaker, this bill is probably the most important piece of legislation that has to be considered by this Congress. It involves the establishment of civil government in the Canal Zone, it involves the abandonment of the plan by which the canal has been constructed, it contemplates the disbandment of the workmen who are there now as the work progresses, and the organization, out of a force of some 30,000 men now on the canal, of a permanent force for the operation of the canal. It involves the reduction of Executive orders that heretofore have been issued and by which the canal is being governed. It involves the creation of courts and the granting of jurisdiction to courts in order to deal with subject matters that may come up for an adjudication in the courts, both involving points of admiralty and civil administration. It involves the establishment of stations to furnish coal, and other matters, by the Navy.

The committee has agreed practically on every section of this law except two. One of them is with regard to the question whether tolls shall be imposed upon vessels engaged in coastwise trade. Upon that there is a minority report signed by five members of the committee. Then there is some disagreement as to another section of the bill, and that is as to whether steamships owned in whole or in part by railroad companies shall be permitted to use the canal.

And I think there ought to be considerable time for the discussion of these matters, important as they are.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman from Louisiana any suggestion to make as to the length of time?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I should like to have at least three days of general debate on this question.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] evidently does not understand the request of the gentleman from Georgia. The gentleman from Georgia is not undertaking to limit debate at this time. He is simply seeking to get an agreement that the debate shall be confined to the bill under consideration, and that the time shall be divided between those who favor it and those who are opposed. I can see no objection to that.

Mr. BROUSSARD. We can see no objection to it either, but I would like to know if we have enough time in which to consider——

The SPEAKER. It is not the time to fix the length of debate now.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to suggest that the great appropriation bills ought to become laws before the 1st of July. They will either have to become laws by that date or else temporary action will have to be taken by Congress for the support of the Government service. After the middle of June there will not be very much work done by the House or by the Senate, if Congress remains in session, before the middle of July. I think it is quite possible for the House to get through with the appropriation bills and the Panama Canal bill and any emergency matters that may be pressing and still adjourn by the middle of June [applause], but it can not be done unless the House is willing to work between now and the middle of June.

Now, I suggest to the gentleman that if we are going to have a long debate on the Panama Canal bill—a long, general debate—we ought to have night sessions——

Mr. GARNER. That is right——

Mr. MANN. And finish the Panama Canal bill and have a final vote on it before Saturday night.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the House in the same line with the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois—and the Chair thinks it will be an accommodation to the Members—that there are still four more appropriation bills to be considered—the naval appropriation bill, the Military Academy bill, the sundry civil bill, and the general deficiency bill—and the Members can make up their minds from experience, those who have been here, how long it will take to get through with those four bills.

Mr. MANN. We could pass the Military Academy bill in——

Mr. GARNER. Two hours——

Mr. MANN. In less than an afternoon, and we ought to be able to pass the naval bill in a couple of days, or three days.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman hope to pass that bill in three days?

Mr. MANN. If we have evening sessions, I think so.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I wish to inquire, Mr. Speaker, whether the general debate on this bill, if it is not ended to-day, will be displaced by any special business to-morrow?

Mr. MANN. That will be for the House to determine to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The House can go on with this bill to-morrow if it wants to, or it can let the pension bills come up.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I am perfectly willing to agree to any rule that is made as to night sessions if it is applied impartially to all the business of the House from now on. I am not myself insisting on long, general debate on this bill. I do not think it is worth a cent to stand up here and paw the air and talk to empty benches. [Applause.] I am in favor of general debate going on just as long as the House takes an interest in it, but as soon as the Members show a lack of interest in the general debate I want to begin the reading of the bill under the five-minute rule. That is the best way to enable the Members to understand the bill, anyway.

Now, I ask the other side if there is any objection as to the time, and whether they want any further agreement now than that which I have suggested? What I desire to do now is to arrive at some arrangement whereby general debate can be had on the bill and divide the time between those who are opposed and those who are in favor of it.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I think that is satisfactory to this side, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to say that the members of the Committee on Appropriations are not only interested in the matter in the sense that that committee is responsible for getting the supply bills through, but along with the other Members of the House the members of that committee would like to take some part in the consideration of a bill of this importance; and, speaking for myself, I agree thoroughly with what has just been said by the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, that general debate in this House under modern practice is usually a waste of time. We have too much general debate and too little consideration of a bill under the five-minute rule. [Applause.]

I would be very glad to see an arrangement made by which we can have a time fixed when the bill can be finally voted on, and then have the major portion of the time between that date and now given to the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule, when the best attention is paid to the discussion of legislation in the House.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do.

Mr. GARNER. Under the suggestion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], the chairman of the committee, if it should develop in a couple of hours from now that nobody was paying attention to the general debate in committee we could go back into the House as in Committee of the Whole and debate the bill under the five-minute rule for two days.

Mr. SHERLEY. I understand that. Perhaps it may be possible to have that arrangement later on as to the length of general debate, when some of us are busy with committee duties. I am willing to have three days' general debate, but I am not willing to waste time in addressing remarks to empty benches.

Mr. ADAMSON. I think the House should have ample opportunity for free general debate on this question, but I am willing to agree to the suggestion of the gentleman from Kentucky. But if we should have two or three days of general debate it means that the major portion of the Members will leave the House and only come back when debate is had under the five-minute rule.

Mr. SHERLEY. It might be that an agreement could be reached whereby there should be three or four hours of general debate, and then start in with the reading of the bill under the five-minute rule, and then the bill could be put upon its passage.

Mr. ADAMSON. Whenever the interest begins to lag in general debate we ought to be able to go back into the House as in Committee of the Whole and bring the general debate to a close and proceed under the five-minute rule. That is what we ought to do.

Mr. MANN. Regular order!

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] what he understands by those favoring the bill controlling half the time and those opposing the bill?

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. The gentleman from Louisiana wants to know what the chairman of the committee means when he speaks of dividing the time between those who favor and those who oppose the bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. I mean that those who advocate all the sections of the bill and all the propositions of the bill ought to have half the time; that those who are opposed to any part of the bill ought to have the other half of the time; and so far as I am concerned the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] shall have half the time that I control.

Mr. BROUSSARD. That is perfectly agreeable.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider the Panama Canal bill.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. Speaker, one more matter to which I should like to call attention. Would it not be possible under this arrangement to have a night session to-night?

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Yes.

The SPEAKER. This arrangement does not include that, but if a night session is desired the arrangement can be made.

Mr. ADAMSON. I have no objection to a night session if it is necessary.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Does the gentleman make that a part of his request?

Mr. ADAMSON. I have not yet done so. I suggest that we see how the debate runs along. Later in the day we can do it if it is necessary.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider the Panama Canal bill, and, pending that, he asks that one-half the time be used by those in favor of the bill and one-half by those opposed to any part of this bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I understand from the gentleman from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDER] on the other side of the House, the ranking Members who signed the minority views, that it is perfectly agreeable to them to let the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] apportion the time and divide with them, just as I divide with the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD].

The SPEAKER. That is a matter for the gentlemen to arrange among themselves.

Mr. MANN. I understand the gentleman to make that a part of his request?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] asks that he control half the time and asks that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] control the other half.

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Speaker, I am not thoroughly familiar with the practice, but it would appear to me that in common fairness this time should be controlled one half by those in favor of the bill and the other half by those who oppose the bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. If there was nobody against any section except that one, that would be very true, but other parts of the bill may be assailed.

Mr. DOREMUS. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] are the chief exponents of section 5 and section 11 of this bill, and it does not appear right to me that the time should be under the control of those two gentlemen.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Michigan is misinformed. I differ with the chairman of the committee on important propositions relating to that subject.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will yield time to the gentleman.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, as the ranking member who signed the minority views I want to say that while under ordinary circumstances I believe it is a bad precedent to give to those who favor the bill the control of the entire time, I have so much confidence in the ranking member of the committee on this side, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS], that, knowing he will divide the time evenly, I shall make no objection under the circumstances.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone, with Mr. LLOYD in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I suppose as a matter of form, at least, as a perfunctory performance if nothing else, I am expected to make some statements to the House touching the provisions of the pending bill which I had the honor to report from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. The committee has labored hard and faithfully to ascertain what is right and wise in the premises. It has succeeded, if not to its own satisfaction, in agreeing on a bill unanimously with the exception of two sections. I will say that the work of the committee is agreeable to the canal authorities with the exception of one section. That section the chief engineer did not object to on account of its merits, but because he did not believe that a great work like this ought to be blocked by any matter that could be otherwise disposed of without encumbering so great a project, and also that it might diminish the tolls and traffic in opening the canal. That is section 11, and, as I have mentioned that section, I will at this time call attention to the fact that the committee has perfected and will submit a committee amendment in the nature of a substitute for that section. I will ask the pages to place it on the desks of the Members at this time that they may have it in connection with the bill.

Section 5 of the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, as heretofore amended, is hereby amended by adding thereto a new paragraph at the end thereof, as follows:

"From and after the 1st day of July, 1914, it shall be unlawful for any railroad company or other common carrier subject to the act to regulate commerce to own, lease, operate, control, or have any interest whatsoever (by stock ownership or otherwise, either directly, indirectly, through any holding company, or by stockholders or directors in common, or in any other manner) in any common carrier by water with which said railroad or other carrier aforesaid does or may compete for traffic; and in case of the violation of this provision each day in which such violation continues shall be deemed a separate offense."

Jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the Interstate Commerce Commission to determine questions of fact as to the competition or possibility of competition, after full hearing, on the application of any railroad company or other carrier. Such application may be filed for the purpose of determining whether any existing service is in violation of this section and pray for an order permitting the continuance of any vessel or vessels already in operation, or for the purpose of asking an order to install new service not in conflict with the provisions of this paragraph. The commission may, on its own motion, or the application of any shipper, institute proceedings to inquire into the operation of any vessel in use by any railroad or other carrier which has not applied to the commission and had the question of competition or the possibility of competition determined as herein provided. In all such cases the order of said commission shall be final.

That section 6 of said act to regulate commerce, as heretofore amended, is hereby amended by adding a new paragraph at the end thereof, as follows:

"When property may be or is transported from point to point in the United States by rail and water through the Panama Canal or otherwise, the transportation being by a common carrier or carriers, and not entirely within the limits of a single State, the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have jurisdiction of such transportation and of the carriers, both by rail and by water, which may or do engage in the same, in the following particulars, in addition to the jurisdiction given by the act to regulate commerce, as amended June 18, 1910:

"(a) To establish physical connection between the lines of the rail carrier and the dock of the water carrier by directing the rail carrier to make suitable connection between its line and a track or tracks which have been constructed from the dock to the limits of its right of way, or by directing either or both the rail and water carrier, individually or in connection with one another, to construct and connect with the lines of the rail carrier a spur track or tracks to the dock. This provision shall only apply where such connection is reasonably practicable, can be made with safety to the public, and where the amount of business to be handled is sufficient to justify the outlay.

"The commission shall have full authority to determine the terms and conditions upon which these connecting tracks, when constructed, shall be operated, and it may, either in the construction or the operation of such tracks, determine what sum shall be paid to or by either carrier. The provisions of this paragraph shall extend to cases where the dock is owned by other parties than the carrier involved.

"(b) To establish through routes and maximum joint rates between and over such rail and water lines, and to determine all the terms and conditions under which such lines shall be operated in the handling of the traffic embraced.

"(c) To establish maximum proportional rates by rail to and from the ports to which the traffic is brought, or from which it is taken by the water carrier, and to determine to what traffic and in connection with what vessels and upon what terms and conditions such rates shall apply. By proportional rates are meant those which differ from the corresponding local rates to and from the port and which apply only to traffic which has been brought to the port or is carried from the port by a common carrier by water.

"(d) If any rail carrier subject to the act to regulate commerce enters into arrangements with any water carrier operating from a port in the United States to a foreign country, through the Panama Canal or otherwise, for the handling of through business between interior points of the United States and such foreign country, the Interstate Commerce Commission may require such railway to enter into similar arrangements with any or all other lines of steamships operating from said port to the same foreign country."

The orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission relating to this section shall only be made upon formal complaint or in proceedings instituted by the commission of its own motion and after full hearing. The orders provided for in the two amendments to the act to regulate commerce enacted in this section shall be served in the same manner and enforced by the same penalties and proceedings as are the orders of the commission made under the provisions of section 15 of the act to regulate commerce, as amended June 18, 1910, and they may be conditioned for the payment of any sum or the giving of security for the payment of any sum or the discharge of any obligation which may be required by the terms of said order.

I will state further, Mr. Chairman, that I had placed in the desk of each Member a complete copy of all the hearings in the form of a House document, containing all the evidence, all the statements of everybody who appeared before the committee, the bill reported, and all bills which were considered by the committee at this time, and the majority and minority reports of the committee. They will find them all in that book, and when they replace section 11 with this leaflet, which is now being circulated, they will have the whole matter as the committee understands it.

I will state to gentlemen that in going through the terms of the bill, if there is any matter upon which I am able to afford any information I will be glad to do it if gentlemen will call my attention to the subject upon which they wish to be enlightened.

It has been a very difficult subject. The construction of the canal was a great enterprise, the greatest of its kind ever attempted by man, and the legislation for its control and management and operation must necessarily be important and fraught with very great difficulties and differences of opinion. In fact, at the very outset of the enterprise there were so many intelligent men in this great country, which possesses more strong and educated minds than any in the world, now or at any time in the past, that they began at once to cast about and make suggestions. Selfish interests began to agitate, fancies of mind began an active career, and all sorts of notions and fads, and also some good ideas, were advanced.

The committee from the outset put its face steadfastly to the front, putting all things of that kind aside, insisting on, first, the construction of the canal, and then the solution of all questions incident thereto. In the very outset people began to talk about whether you could not use the canal for this private interest or that private interest, and if you could not use it for ship subsidy, forgetting that Congress for 100 years, though constantly importuned by a sleepless lobby, has refused to provide a ship subsidy; others, overlooking the millions of unoccupied acres of land in this glorious country, the best country and Government on earth, began to spin theories and build castles and build ideal forms of government and institute ideal republics in these tropical regions before we had gotten rid of the mosquitoes and the malaria and before we had made sure that we could live there long enough to build the canal or whether anybody could live there long enough to stay there and operate it, much less reside there for any length of time.

Some distinguished gentlemen proposed, before the dirt was ever broken very deep below where the French left it on Culebra, that we erect a great luminary of learning on the Isthmus to educate and enlighten everybody in Central and South America.

They filed resolutions and bills and said that nothing should be bought unless it was used as a basis for a particular business, particular lines of transportation and manufacture, and all that sort of thing.

But we kept straight ahead, looking out for the clearing of the jungle, the sanitation of the zone, the acquirement of the title to the land, the construction of the canal, and the preparation for its opening for the use of the Army and Navy of the United States, and, incidentally, when they were not using it, for the purpose of accommodating commerce and recouping the Treasury of the United States with whatever money we could derive therefrom. It is now thought that triumph is about to crown our efforts in the way of physical construction. The engineers have completed their work. The physical work is almost done. The dry excavation is about finished. The lake at Gatun is being raised this month. The system of dams and locks at each end of the summit level designed to receive the Chagres River and fill up the entire summit level of the canal and furnish water to operate the locks is about finished, or will be during the coming summer. The lake will be filled far enough to cover up the unexcavated places, and then the dipper dredges will do the balance. It will not be claimed that the canal is finished until the slides cease to come down at Culebra and one or two other minor places. It would not be fair to open the canal and say that it is finished and then have to stop and excavate the dirt sliding in and charge that up to maintenance. Until the slides have quit, and we have settled the banks—the slopes—we can not say that the canal is finished, and we ought to charge all of that up to construction and not to maintenance. When that is done it is expected that the canal will be opened for the use of our Army and Navy and for the public.

We have provided in the first section of the bill for defining the Canal Zone, and in that connection we name the canal and we name the zone. That is appropriate in the outset, especially for the reason that that canal is not in our own country.

If it had been on American soil, with an American port at each end, we would not have had to make any such definition. We would not have found it necessary to frame any such bill; we would have simply gone to work under an act of Congress, making appropriations, without consulting any other nation on the face of the earth, and we would have proceeded; and it would have been a domestic canal subject to our own sweet will, without any restriction, permission, let, or hindrance. But, unlike any other canal of the sort—and it is unlike any other of the sort in every respect—we were forced to go to a foreign country in order to dig that canal.

The only other two canals in history that can be compared with it are the Kiel Canal and the Suez Canal. The Kiel Canal was built by the Emperor of Germany very much as we have built ours, in one respect, as a Government canal primarily for the use of the Army and Navy. It is entirely in his own domain, under the jurisdiction of Germany at both ports, and he did not have to consult anybody else about it. He proceeded to construct it.

The Suez Canal is a great commercial canal, but is not comparable to ours in magnitude or in expense or in difficulties of construction. It is a commercial canal, and was reconstructed in modern times by a commercial company organized under the laws of France. The country in which it is constructed being too weak to build it itself, its financiers being unable to construct and operate it, it had to look abroad for capital. That capital was found in the various countries of Europe, a great many of them, away up in the teens. All of those countries united in a convention for the control and government and management and neutrality and neutralization of that canal. That canal was not originally constructed in that way. In ancient times, before the dawn of history, an Egyptian king started out to construct that canal. It is also in the Tropics, but he had slave subjects, and under the whip and lash he put them to work digging that canal. Incidentally he killed 140,000 of them in doing it. He did not dig it as we dug ours, to shorten the distance and make communication more easy, but he dug it in the longest way, in order to avoid the invasion of enemies thereby. Yet, fatally for him, he had to quit it, and an enemy did invade and seize it, and while in possession of the country, as a conqueror, Darius finished that canal; but in both these cases the canal was built under the domination of a Government and was entirely within the country of that Government.

The Panama Canal was the culmination of a long series of diplomacy, legislation, contracts, exploitation, efforts of financiers almost all around the world to construct a canal across the Isthmus.

No matter who might construct it, it had to be done by foreigners. None of those countries were able to do it, neither Colombia, New Granada, Nicaragua—none of them were able to construct that work. It was discussed by numerous monarchs in Europe for hundreds of years. We began to discuss it nearly a hundred years ago ourselves. We had ourselves so tied up in our relations with other countries, in addition to the fact that that was in a foreign country, that we were not at liberty to go ahead with it. Finally, by a reconstruction of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, we did remove the objections to its construction by the United States Government in a foreign country by agreeing with England to retain all the provisions in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty as to neutralization and equal fair dealing and removing the humiliating proposition that we had to rely on other countries to sustain its neutrality and assuming ourselves the duty of opening, protecting, and maintaining the neutralization and the equality of the use of the canal. But it still remains in a foreign country, and it required a contract with the Governments of two countries to get permission to construct it. We are bound to comply with the terms of those two agreements, one with England in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and the other the Republic of Panama. We had no right to do anything but build and operate the canal; therefore in the treaty and the canal act we provide for the control of the territory for the purpose of constructing, maintaining, and operating that canal, but still in accordance with the spirit in which we have proceeded through all these negotiations—that we are not looking for a place of colonization to gain influence and unfair advantage, but we were simply to construct a canal for the free and equal use of all the people interested in that canal everywhere, of every nation. Therefore we appropriately, in the first section of the bill, define the Canal Zone exactly in accordance with the treaties, naming the canal and naming the Canal Zone. In the second section of the bill we deem it proper, for a very good reason, to stop and legalize and ratify everything that has been done there. When we acquired the Canal Zone it was done rather suddenly. We had had long negotiations.

Congress was in session and we did not know just exactly what the final upshot of the whole thing would be. We wanted time to see what we were going to do there—what legislation ought to be enacted—so temporarily we reenacted or adopted and made applicable the old statute for the temporary government of Louisiana at the time we purchased that, and provided that it should expire by its own terms with the end of the Fifty-eighth Congress, and, for reasons which the House understood and deemed satisfactory, and which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will remember, that temporary act was allowed to lapse at the end of the Fifty-eighth Congress. The commission, which this House had always objected to, was turned out of office the next day and a new régime instituted. Our committee again went to Panama and looked over the situation. The Appropriations Committee began to make visits there annually, and under the stimulation of changed conditions the work proceeded, but occasionally gentlemen complained of a monarchy down there, of absolutism; that without law and authority the President had proceeded to administer the government and construct the canal, and that it did not become the institutions of a great free country to permit that. Our reply was, We have law enough to sustain it, it is ours, we bought and paid for it, and we had acts of Congress authorizing us to proceed and to build it so he certainly could get along until he got it built; that we were ready to legislate as much as necessary at the proper time, but that we are not ready to proceed to the enactment of a long and elaborate system of jurisprudence in a country where we did not expect to have any population, where we did not expect at best to have anything but the canal, and the President, by the approval of Congress and the sanction of annual appropriations by Congress, has proceeded issuing Executive orders. Courts were established, and the officials were appointed under that temporary statute and have simply been continued by Executive order. In order to be sure that there can be no sort of criticism, no question of the legitimacy and regularity, we provide in the second section of this bill and approve all the laws now in force on the zone and recognize and sanction all the courts that are now on the zone. There we cut short the one-man power connected with the administration. That, of course, leaves it to the United States Government to make future legislation, the question of amending the laws, and the courts of law, and as to all civil institutions—everything of that sort remains with Congress.

We did not undertake in this bill to revise and reform the entire system of law. We did not have time to do it.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Will the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON]?

Mr. ADAMSON. With pleasure.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I observe that section 2 provides that the Executive orders shall become laws until changed by Congress, but subsequent sections of the bill, as I read, go on to provide that the President shall make the laws. Is that to be a law of men instead of a law by Congress? The gentleman and I have had very sharp differences in the past in regard to the government of the zone, and I wish that he would explain to the House, if he deems wise, what will be the physical aspect of the zone after the canal is completed, what kind of people will live there, what extent of land will be covered by water, and what emergencies would arise that called for the application of laws?

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, the differences between the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] and myself have not been substantial differences. They have been as to the time of action only. The gentleman thought it necessary, or deemed it wise, to legislate before I thought we were ready to legislate. That is the only difference between us. I thought it wise to wait until this time when we knew that we were going to succeed triumphantly in our enterprise and remain on the zone to operate the canal forever. Then I thought it would be time enough to legislate for the people there. And now his question comes in opportunely, because I was just coming to the section that touches on his question. Section 3 authorizes the President to secure for the United States all the outstanding titles and possession to land which we have not already acquired.

The Gatun Dam is 6 or 7 miles out from Colon. We call our town Cristobal. At the Gatun Dam there will be another town. Farther over, at the other end of the summit level, which is about 6 or 7 miles from Balboa, the Pacific end of the canal, there will be another town. Between that town and Gatun, about 34 miles, will be the crest or the summit level of the canal. A part of that will be lakes. I believe about one-third of the area will be covered by water when those lakes are filled. That, of course, will cover all of the lowland. Under present arrangements I assume we have settled about all of those claims. The balance of the land in the zone which will not be covered by those lakes is hardly suitable for any sort of cultivation or farming in which an American citizen would indulge. It rains down there about nine months in the year regularly, and three or four hours a day for the balance of the time, as I have found by personal experience. The dry season is too short to produce and gather any kind of a crop that we want, and the wet season is not favorable to the production and cultivation of crops.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will my colleague permit me to make this suggestion right there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Certainly.

Mr. HAMLIN. It developed in evidence before our committee that the Agricultural Department had made very exhaustive experiments down there, and had determined that it was not available for agricultural pursuits.

Mr. ADAMSON. In addition to the correct suggestion made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN], I will say that most of the land in addition, uncovered by the lakes, will be the hilly lands. There are short, sharp peaks, which are mighty pretty. If you had a number of them in your front yard they would be delightful. They are lovely to look at for a little while. But to live on a farm the year around the gentleman would not find it as delightful as Horace and other literary men in the past have tried to make us think.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. I will.

Mr. BORLAND. Listening to the suggestion of the gentleman's colleague from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] that the Agricultural Department had made an investigation to determine the agricultural value of these lands, is it a fact that their investigations determined, as to the products of the Temperate Zone, that they could be raised there successfully?

Mr. ADAMSON. I would not undertake to decide that controversy. Of course, there are some products of the Tropics that would grow there if properly attended to, and I have no doubt if a man had lots of money and millions of resources and was acclimated to live in that country and he wanted to go there and turn loose measureless wealth on his agricultural experiments, he might have as good a time wasting money there as he could have anywhere else, and that, in my judgment, would be the upshot of the venture, because the evidence before us showed there have been no successful farming ventures of any sort in the zone. Some little farms up and down the Isthmus have proven profitable, but not on the zone.

But, Mr. Chairman, this is our proposition: We have bought or acquired jurisdiction over a strip 5 miles wide on both sides of the center thread of the canal for canal purposes, not for colonization and not for agriculture. You may find in many States of the South and West better land and more land than that, with a better climate for folks to live in, if you want to establish a colony.

Mr. BUCHANAN. But not with so much water.

Mr. ADAMSON. No; but you can find plenty of water if you go with me, and better land.

The primary object of the acquisition of that strip or zone was to construct and operate a canal, and the Government of the United States certainly has the right to acquire the title to all the land, and hold it, and own it until it starts the canal, and then exercise its own judgment and volition as to what use it will make of any of it that is not actually needed in navigating and operating the canal.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question right there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. ADAMSON. Certainly.

Mr. TILSON. What does the gentleman say as to the possibility of living there after this lake is filled up, and after the partly submerged land has become a jungle again? Will it not produce mosquitoes and other insects and all sorts of animal life, up to the size of crocodiles, that will make it at least dangerous or undesirable to live there?

Mr. ADAMSON. Well, it is thought that when we lay out the United States barracks and parade grounds for the military there will not be very much ground left except what only a goat could travel over. [Laughter.] These hills, you must understand, are very steep and abrupt. They are going to try to find level and smooth land enough for the barracks for the troops that they have to have there for the military police and administration of the zone.

Mr. TILSON. I understand that much of the large lake formed by means of Gatum Dam will be very shallow water, and, being in the Tropics, it seems to me it would revert to a very dense jungle in a short time, and in this jungle there would be produced all sorts of enemies to health and human life that would make it uncomfortable and even dangerous for men to live on the zone even to operate the canal.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentlemen who will operate the canal will live at the towns, where they have artificial means of comfort. They will have refrigerators and cooled air and screened houses and every civilized convenience and opportunity to keep them alive. They can live a little better there, and it is not expected that they will live between those dams at all. It is not intended that the jungle will be allowed to grow up again along the line of the canal. I suppose it will be necessary to keep most of it cleared occasionally in order to avoid intruders coming up covertly and doing mischief and being where they ought not to be.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado rose.

Mr. ADAMSON. There is one thing that I omitted to state about the population of that zone, and that is that the water supply for all the towns and cities must come from those hills, and the health experts say it is not wise to permit any population to remain on those watersheds at all, as it would produce impurities in the water, and that that is an additional reason why there should not be any population there.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I only wish to observe that the fears expressed and the conditions described by the gentleman from Connecticut already exist in the Canal Zone. A thousand feet away from the line of the railroad, or of the canal, there is nothing but a jungle now, filled with mosquitoes and all the tropical conditions of disease, and it could not be rendered any worse by reason of the fact that the Government might here and there destroy a little cluster of native huts up in the hills. I believe that some gentlemen have an impression that the whole Canal Zone is in such a civilized and cultivated state now that it is in danger of being reduced again to a jungle if we put the people out. But it is a fact, as I think everyone that has been there knows, that a stone's throw from the line of actual operations is just as much a jungle as it was when the Spaniards first went there 400 years ago.

Mr. ADAMSON. The natives, or squatters, or the Chinese, or mixed breeds, or whatever they are, had built their little towns right along the line of the Panama Railroad, which is also the line of the canal. Most of those towns will be flooded by the canal when the lake is filled, and of course those people have been bought out and have been removed. If they are not allowed to locate elsewhere in the zone they will not be there any more. The population there now, over whom our courts are operating, consists mostly of our officials and laborers, aggregating somewhere between 30,000 and 40,000 men.

Those laborers, as their time expires, will be returned to their homes. It is not expected that after the canal is opened there will be any population there on the zone except the American employees operating the canal, and their families.

Mr. BORLAND. Does not the gentleman think that, irrespective of that rough land up in the hills between the two dams, the bottom lands surrounding both ends of the canal will be very desirable for commercial purposes? This bill provides that all of the lands shall be acquired by the United States Government and condemned practically as a military reservation.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, it is true that at the ends of the canal, around those cities, there is some pretty good land, and conditions will be somewhat different there. I think that probably the Government has most of the land that it wants at the ends of the canal. It has most of the land in the city of Colon. It has considerable land in the city of Panama. It is expected that there will be population in the cities at the two ends of the canal.

Mr. BORLAND. At Balboa there is a large tract of land that the Government does not own and does not claim to own. The part colored green on the map represents what the Government concedes to be private land.

Mr. ADAMSON. The committee think the Government has a right to acquire it and hold it if it needs it, and that it ought to be its own judge as to how badly it needs it or what use it ought to make of it, and whether it ought to keep it or not.

Mr. BORLAND. If the gentleman will yield for a question right on that point, this particular bill provides not only for the acquisition of all the land in the zone, but it also provides that no person shall be upon the zone without the permission of the military governor.

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. In other words, if the Government acquires all that land around the terminal at Balboa or at Cristobal nobody could be there without the permission of the Government, and there could be no commercial business carried on practically without favoritism.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not think it would be much trouble for a man who ought to be there to secure the necessary permission.

Mr. BORLAND. That is not the question. The question is whether it would encourage commercial pursuits there to require special permission from the Government.

Mr. ADAMSON. We have not yet gone far enough to abandon canal purposes and take up commercial purposes. This committee is now trying to build a canal.

Mr. BORLAND. I understand that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] believes primarily in a military canal, and incidentally in a commercial canal.

Mr. ADAMSON. "The gentleman from Georgia" believes primarily in a canal, and in finishing it and opening it and operating it. Then, if there are any incidental things that Congress wants to do, there will be time enough to consider them.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, referring to the exclusion of inhabitants from the zone, does not the gentleman think there would be some advantage in having the zone settled by Americans, if they could be induced to go there, with a view to policing the district and relieving the Government of the expense of so large a military establishment as seems to be necessary?

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not think there will be any trouble about inducing men to go there for their salaries; and instead of the gentleman finding people flocking there to make vicarious sacrifices and to work for the Government for nothing, he will find people congregating around there, just as they do everywhere else where Government pap is open for distribution, begging for salaries; and when they get salaries they will want promotions the next day.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Conceding there is some truth in the gentleman's statement, might it not be a relief to the Government in the matter of the expense of maintenance, and particularly in the matter of protection, if the zone should be opened up for settlement by men who would attempt to till the soil?

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, if after the canal is opened and put in operation we should find it desirable to have American citizens there for any purpose, our position is that it will be time enough then to consider the subject. Meantime, pending the completion of the canal, we would like to complete the purpose of the acquisition of that jurisdiction by acquiring title and ownership to the land, in order that when we are in possession of it we may decide the very questions that gentlemen are now asking me. They are premature. The movement is premature.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Georgia has given very careful attention to the cost of the maintenance of the canal; does he now consider it wholly a military enterprise that must be maintained by the Government, or does he admit the commercial and agricultural possibilities with a view to raising money from the enterprise to help maintain it?

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, the United States did not go to Panama to run a farm. We had lots of land at home for that purpose, and if the Government had any it would sell it out and give it away, as it has with a thousand million acres. It went to Panama, under the only constitutional warrant, to construct a canal as a war measure for the use of the Army and the Navy. I have no doubt a great many men in their minds gave their consent to it solely for commercial purposes. But I am talking about the constitutional warrant which authorized Congressmen on their oaths to vote for the bill. The Government went there to build it as a Government canal for the use of the Government. It may use it for commercial purposes, and we all hope that the prophets or apostles of peace who are optimistically proclaiming 50 years' millennium, while the nations are overrunning each other to increase their armament—I do hope that there will be long years of peace, and that during that peace, whether long or short, the United States can acquire a great deal of money from the tolls through that canal; that while it is not the business of Congress to foster all the details of local commerce in the various sections, I do hope that all the commerce of the United States will blossom like a rose and flourish like a trust. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. ADAMSON. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This is a very important phase of the question. I am under the impression that a large majority of the people of the country believe that the opening of the Panama Canal will tend to develop the commerce of the United States, and help us to closer connections with the Latin-American Governments.

Mr. ADAMSON. I hope that will be done, although I never pinned my faith on the Panama Canal as the only instrument of doing that, but I think the people ought to do something in their private and collective capacity without making a packhorse of Congress by imposing their private and selfish interests upon everything that the Government seeks to put in motion.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am not striving to argue with the gentleman. From a perusal of the hearings it would seem that the chairman of the committee, who has given this matter careful study, has been of the opinion that the construction of the canal was almost wholly for military purposes and that if it were to be used for commercial purposes commerce in some way should bear a portion of the expense.

Mr. ADAMSON. I should think him an unfaithful public servant of the Government who would give away any assets of the people, and I am sure when the canal is used by any man, whether he calls himself commerce or what not, or goes through it, the Government is entitled to some compensation for his going through. I think he would be very selfish to try to take it away from the people.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The construction of the canal at an approximate cost of $400,000,000 and an annual cost of maintenance of probably $25,000,000, was not done merely for the purpose of permitting some modern Oregon to pass through to be used in some war that is yet to happen.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the Oregon had not gone around the Horn to give the people an object lesson and arouse them to help us build this canal, it would not have been built for a hundred years.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But as the Oregon did go around the Horn to protect the Government in a war and the people of the country did provide the money to construct this monumental work, to the great credit of the American engineers, is it not advisable that we should get something back, by letting the Army and the Navy and the country understand that this is not wholly a military enterprise, but that it was constructed as well for the development of the trade and commerce of the United States and to strengthen our commercial status abroad?

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not think the Army and the Navy regard it as entirely a military affair. I do not think they want to fight all the time, and I do not think they want to go through every day.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. They do not want to stay in the canal all the time, and I do not think we built the canal to keep them there.

Mr. ADAMSON. I think, however, that when we have a war and when it is necessary as a war measure to transfer vessels, the object of the digging of the canal primarily was to give them the benefit of it.

I think they agree with me further that when the exigencies of the Army and Navy do not require the use of the locks that we would put through, if the vessels applied for passage, about 48 vessels a day, and get the tolls from every single one of them and put those tolls into the Treasury of the United States, where the $400,000,000 came from that built the canal. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That would help to replenish the expenditures.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is the doctrine of the committee, and the doctrine of the Army and Navy, I hope.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then it is not the purpose of the committee to discourage commerce through the canal, but rather to encourage it.

Mr. ADAMSON. No; it is not the doctrine of the committee to discourage commerce. We are in favor of it, and if the gentleman will read the bill a little further he will find a section providing that it be open to the world and that commerce be invited to come through and to pay tolls every time it does come through. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman, of course, knows that the expense of the military and naval establishment will be very great.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not know about that; but it ought to be great enough to protect the canal. In our pride we thought we were strong enough not to rely upon the other nations of the world to provide for the neutralization, so we provided in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty that we alone would be responsible for the neutralization of the canal; and it may be necessary for us to put men and guns enough there at some time to whip some nation that tries to interfere with that neutrality and equality. We do no know; but if any other nation should bristle up and say they were going to disregard that neutrality and do as they pleased with the canal, we could not, as we could under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, call on England and some other nations to help, but we would be under the obligation ourselves of protecting the canal against all enemies, and we will have the right to put there just such force and such guns as we need to maintain that neutrality and equality as against anyone.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ADAMSON. Certainly.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman what he means by the use of the word "neutrality" in that connection. He says that we propose to have guns and men enough there to insure that neutrality.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether I am a good enough dictionary or not. I never have looked in an English dictionary many times in my life. What few words I did learn I learned as a boy from the Latin and a Greek lexicon.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I hope the gentleman will not think I am criticizing him at all. I am asking him the question in all sincerity.

Mr. ADAMSON. And I am going to answer it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I was asking for information, and the gentleman answers as though I were asking the question in a critical way.

Mr. ADAMSON. Oh, no, Mr. Chairman; I was excusing my own imperfection as a lexicographer. I am going to guess at it and give my friend an answer which I think he will agree with me is correct. I hope he will. I have great confidence in his judgment, both as a civilian and as a warrior, and he has been my candidate for Secretary of War for a long time. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. SLAYDEN. Give us the right administration and we will attend to that.

Mr. ADAMSON. I think that "neutral" is properly applicable to a country or a man who stands aloof from a row, who does not want to have anything to do with it. He is generally hated and despised by both sides and accused by each of covertly helping the other. [Laughter.] That is his fate in politics and everything else. "Neutralization," as I would judge from what little diplomatic history I have read, would mean that somebody would undertake to see that an instrumentality or a route or an appliance, something that men or commerce and nations use——

Mr. SLAYDEN. The canal, for illustration.

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes; the canal, for illustration—and that is the thing we will apply the epithet to—that neutralization would mean that it would be open on equal terms to anybody and everybody on the face of the earth. And when we say we guarantee it, we mean that we are going to see that nobody is interfered with in the use of it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman, of course, knows that there was talk of the neutralization of the canal by certain great powers of the world, thereby obviating the necessity for a strong military or defensive force on the canal?

Mr. ADAMSON. That is right; and that is the arrangement with the Suez and was the arrangement under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

Mr. SLAYDEN. And I had in my mind the idea that that was what the phrase "neutrality of the canal," or "neutralization," meant.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is the difference between the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty neither the United States nor Great Britain was permitted to acquire any prestige or influence on the Isthmus; no other power was allowed to acquire any use or advantage in conditions or terms of traffic or treatment, and the nations of the world were to be invited to unite with England and the United States in an agreement to guarantee the neutralization of the canal.

But just after the United States had succeeded in doing what no other nation nor combination of nations on earth could do, whip the South, and just after they had driven France out of Mexico, why they up and jumped on poor old Spain that had not had one dollar nor a friend nor seen a victory for 300 years, and we got to be so cocky and got to be such jingoes that we said to England, We are not going to fool along with you at all; it is true you have got Canada, reaching from one ocean to the other as we do; it is true you have some possessions in the West Indies; it is true you have your guns frowning on us from stations from Labrador to the south seas, but we are not going to fool with you and will not meddle with you. We told Spain to get out and you had better let us alone; we are going to have that canal to use as we please. We got mighty biggity about that, and after several discussions and meetings, and so forth, and the rejection of some propositions, we secured a modification of the treaty. The modification is that section 8 in all its spirit and intendment shall be preserved. That neutralization shall be preserved; that equal treatment at the canal for people and vessels for all nations shall be preserved, but we abrogated the inhibition against fortifications, because we abandoned the proposition for a jointure of the nations of the world to protect the neutralization and allow the United States to assume the sole duty to carry out the identical provisions that formerly were to be protected by a combination of nations, and in spirit the same principle of neutralization that is in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. Therefore, the United States, in consideration of assuming the entire responsibility in maintaining neutralization, is exempt from the prohibition on fortfications and can establish and use such military police and such military provisions and such force as is necessary to protect that canal against violence, lawlessness, disorder, or anything else that interferes with the neutralization that we guaranteed.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Then the difference is that under the old Clayton-Bulwer treaty that would have neutralized the canal, cooperating with England and other countries at the joint expense of the nations signatory, but now we undertake all the expense and concede the use and privileges of the canal to all upon the same terms.

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ADAMSON. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. I understood the gentleman to say that by the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty we assume the entire obligation in maintaining the neutrality of the canal, whatever that may be. Does not the gentleman understand that England assumed practically the same responsibility and obligation that we did under article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty?

Mr. ADAMSON. No, sir.

Mr. MONDELL. Is not she just as much bound as we are to see that the canal shall not be blockaded or that no right of war shall be exercised in it, no act of hostility committed? Is not section 3 just as binding on Great Britain as it is on us?

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not know that we would call her an accommodation indorser, but she probably would stand behind us if any other nation or combination of nations were about to overrun us. If we manifested that we were unable to carry out the policy that we saw fit to adopt, then I have no doubt on earth she would come to our assistance.

Mr. MONDELL. If we did not fortify the canal at all and there was an attempt made to blockade it or to commit an act of war, is not England already as much bound by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to protect that act as we would be?

Mr. ADAMSON. Well, I suppose England would feel her obligation to help protect it if we failed.

Mr. MONDELL. But is not that what we agreed to do?

Mr. ADAMSON. What we agreed to do.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I think the gentleman is in error in regard to the application of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The application there is that England only agrees not to commit the acts provided for in article 3, and we agree not to commit the acts set forth in article 3, and nobody else who agrees to preserve the rules agrees not to commit the acts——

Mr. ADAMSON. If you will read it, you will see it says the United States adopts for its use.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. But the power to enforce the performance of the Government is set forth in Article III, and so England has agreed.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman from Minnesota will look at the language there, he will find there is expressly stated the language the United States adopts for the neutralization of the canal.

Mr. MONDELL. I will not take the gentleman's time longer, as I expect to discuss the matter later, but it seems to me that the treaty places the same obligation on England that we assume.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will say to the gentleman from Wyoming that I had not yet reached the discussion of the treaty, and I did not care to discuss the fortifications at all, because the question of fortifying the canal is before another committee and has been passed on by Congress.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I want to challenge the statement made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] to the effect that under our treaty with Great Britain we are bound to let the other nations use the canal on the same terms as American citizens. There is no such language in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The language says:

Such conditions as to charges and traffic as shall be just and equitable.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, we have not reached the question of ship subsidy yet, and I expect when we reach that point the gentlemen will have a fair opportunity to discuss it, and I prefer to go on with the structure of the bill and reserve that to the last; and when we reach that, if the gentleman wishes to ask any questions about it, I think I will be ready to answer him on that proposition.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I did not want that statement to go unchallenged.

Mr. ADAMSON. It will take more than a challenge; and if the gentleman overthrows the statement of the gentleman from Texas in that he will not only invade the United States Treasury, but overthrow all the treaties of the United States on that subject. The obligation binds us to "terms of entire equality as to charges and conditions of traffic as to the vessels and citizens of all nations."

Mr. ALEXANDER. I expect to answer the gentleman on that question.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will read the books to you on that subject. I will not read from the ship-subsidy papers on that subject, but from the treaty.

The fourth section authorizes the President, in finishing up the canal, to select and train from the operatives such men as he judges competent to organize into an operating force to man the locks and operate the canal, and it also provides that when the canal has proceeded near enough to completion to dispense with the present organization authorized to construct it, the present organization, including the commission, be dispensed with; that a governor of the Panama Canal be appointed, and such other officers as the President may deem competent, to operate the locks and operate the canal and serve the Government on the zone in the necessary capacities and to open the canal formally to the world. In providing that section——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used an hour's time. Does the gentleman wish the Chair to call his attention to it? The gentleman, of course, controls the time and can take as much as he pleases.

Mr. ADAMSON. I expect that I would better go on with the matter now.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question? Does the gentleman intend to discuss during his opening remarks the question of reduction in the cost of transporting and the difference in the cost of production on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts by the use of the canal?

Mr. ADAMSON. I suppose, Mr. Chairman, that in the course of the debate either I or some other member of the committee will discuss that phase of the question. I have not reached it yet.

Mr. MONDELL. It is a very important question even early in the debate.

Mr. ADAMSON. If I fail to touch upon it, I will say to the gentleman from Wyoming, I hope the gentleman will, but if I do not forget it I expect to say something about it when I reach it.

Mr. Chairman, we did not follow the suggestion of the administration in this provision, but I think I am authorized to say that the substitution of our plan is entirely agreeable to the administration. The only difference between it and the suggestion of the administration is the one raised by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON]. The proposition in the administration bills—I do not know that I ought properly to call them "administration bills," but they were offered by those officials who have been connected with the constructing of the canal and governing the zone—at any rate, we proposed to legalize the present status, but decided it was time to change that plan and leave to Congress the subject of legislation and have Congress provide for the administration of justice and the jurisdiction of civil officers and all those things. Therefore, we provided that the President might appoint the governor of the Panama Canal, with the advice and consent of the Senate, and any other officers he may appoint who are necessary to operate the canal. And at the proper time, when the canal is finished and ready for use, the President shall have it formally opened and all the world invited to the canal.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I find, on page 10 of the bill, that the President is authorized by the bill to make all the necessary rules and regulations and establish the procedure of the magistrates' courts and all such matters on his own motion and by Executive order in the future, just as he has been doing contrary to law in the past.

Mr. ADAMSON. In answer to that I will say to the gentleman from New York that the present law covers all those things. We have legalized and adopted them until Congress makes other provision. Until Congress makes that other provision, we intend that the provision that the gentleman from New York alludes to should authorize the President to supply any deficiencies in practice only.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. This is not an unfriendly question at all, I will say to the gentleman. Why did not the gentleman's committee do that now? We were promised eight years ago that it would be done.

Mr. ADAMSON. Those courts take the place of magistrates' and district courts under existing law, and we really found no objection to them. I do not think the gentleman would, if he examined them, and the language to which he alludes does not authorize the President to repeal or abolish any of them. He can not do it. But if there is any necessary rule of practice or any instrumentality that is unprovided for in making a change from one system to the other, we thought it wise that the President be allowed to bridge the hiatus, if necessary, by passing any of these little matters. But there is an existing system and code covering those courts and their jurisdiction, and, I think, covering everything. This provision that the gentleman speaks of is more in the nature of a catchall, or security, to throw out, so that if there is anything left we could pick it up and not suffer by it. That is all that amounts to.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. ADAMSON. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. I would like to ask this question of the gentleman: Does the bill leave it entirely discretionary with the President whether the canal shall be entirely under the control of an officer of the Army or of a civilian?

Mr. ADAMSON. A subsequent clause of the bill provides that upon the approach of war the governor of the Panama Canal shall surrender control to the Army officer on the zone designated by the President, and be obedient to him in all things touching the operation of the canal and the administration of the zone pending the war.

Mr. HILL. Why would it not be well to recognize that the canal itself is a war instrument, and accordingly have it under the control of the Army all the time, and then there would be no change?

Mr. ADAMSON. There is a grave objection to that. The gentleman from Pennsylvania and I had a conversation about it, and he thinks it ought to be a civil affair and that the Army should be put in control of it only when we get into a fight.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. With pleasure.

Mr. MANN. Would it be possible for the President to appoint an Army officer as governor of the canal?

Mr. ADAMSON. I think there is a statute that would require an Army officer to resign or be retired if he should accept ordinarily a civil office. If this office of the governor of the Panama Canal is held to be a civil office, such as ordinarily is covered by that statute, it would not be possible for the President to appoint an Army officer as governor of the canal under that statute.

Mr. MANN. That statute as it is?

Mr. ADAMSON. If it is.

Mr. MANN. I say "as it is."

Mr. ADAMSON. Then the Army officer would be ineligible, and it has occurred to me to submit to the committee at the proper time the propriety of offering an amendment providing that an officer of the Army or Navy or a civilian may be eligible without forfeiting his present position.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will offer that amendment and make it conform to the existing law in other cases, under which an Army or Navy officer or civilian officer may be appointed to a civil place of this kind and have his statutory salary deducted from the salary that is allowed.

Mr. ADAMSON. I had that in mind, and I thank the gentleman for calling my attention to it, because I would have forgotten to mention it if the gentleman from Illinois had not asked the question. If the committee agrees with me I will offer that amendment as a committee amendment, and if they do not I will offer it as an individual.

Now, that brings us, Mr. Chairman, to the opening of the canal and to section 5, which is one of the disputed sections. I will pass that for the present, and when I reach section 11 I will pass that also until I finish discussing the bill. Then I hope to be allowed to make a few remarks on those two sections in conclusion.

Section 6 authorizes the installation and operation of wireless telegraphy and keeping and furnishing to our troops and others all necessary supplies, coal, oil, repairs, and so forth.

Mr. Chairman, unless I am asked some questions about it I shall not say much about that section. We found, when we went to the Isthmus, that among a great many causes which brought about the failure of the French, one was the remoteness from home and the inconvenience of furnishing supplies and the means of living. We provided in the first place, after sanitation—after providing for the health of our employees there—to supply them with the necessaries of life and the comforts of life, without which we would not have been able to have secured and retained on the Isthmus the superb organization which we have maintained and under which we have so signally succeeded.

They consist of a lot of things that gentlemen can find explained in the hearings, that are ample not only for the purposes of construction, but are thought to be ample for all possible needs and demands of navigation for years to come. Of course, all will concede the value of the installation of wireless telegraphy, and there is no use to discuss that. They have on the Isthmus a magnificent laundry plant and a cold-storage plant and ice factory, and they propose to complete the necessary dry docks and all the necessary machine shops, if those which we already have are not sufficient, so that the nations of the world may understand that ships going by the Panama route can utilize their space for freight and passengers; that they can revictual and recoal there; that they can be repaired there; that they can be supplied with all necessary laundry facilities; that they can be supplied with everything necessary for the prosecution and completion of their voyages.

Mr. RAKER. On page 8 of the bill, under section 6, which you are discussing, I find this provision, which I should like to have explained:

> Moneys received in the ordinary course of business from the conduct of said business may be expended and reinvested for such purposes without being covered into the Treasury of the United States; and such moneys are hereby appropriated for such purposes, but all deposits of such funds shall be subject to the provisions of existing law relating to the deposit of other public funds of the United States, and any net profits accruing from such business shall annually be covered into the Treasury of the United States. Monthly reports of such receipts and expenditures shall be made to the President by the persons in charge, and annual reports shall be made to the Congress.

Is not that a dangerous provision, and ought not the money all to be converted into the Treasury of the United States and then an estimate provided for what is needed, so that appropriations can be made as in other supply bills?

Mr. MANN. You could not run a laundry in that way.

Mr. ADAMSON. We gave careful consideration to that subject. It is a question both of banking and bookkeeping and the transfer of funds. It is a long way from home. We provide the initial appropriation to lay in those supplies. It is very troublesome, and might be fraught with inconvenience and privation, to have to wait for the return of money for a new supply.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. ADAMSON. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. We carry, for instance, in the Army appropriation bill every year a number of items for ice manufacture, laundry work, and other work of that character at certain Army posts, with the provision that the money received shall be used for the same purposes.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion right there? Here you are going into business on a very, very large scale; at an Army post it is only a small matter, relating to providing for the soldiers in the post.

Mr. MANN. But precisely the same principle is involved. It is impossible to tell how much coal will be used by vessels passing through the Panama Canal.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, is there not this difference? I have just read the paragraph to which the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] refers, and I was thinking it over, and evidently along the same lines that he is. Is there not this difference between that and an Army appropriation for ice and so forth, to which the gentleman from Illinois refers, that in this case they are going to put the Government into big business as a merchant and possibly into competition with citizens who may protest against it?

Mr. MANN. That is the case at the Army posts.

Mr. SLAYDEN. But we provide that they shall not compete with civilians.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well, but they do compete with civilians, if there are any civilians there. There is absolutely no other way of doing it.

Mr. RAKER. The question of competition would not be so much involved as the question of handling the funds. In other words, if the committee, by virtue of a thorough examination, have found good reason for this, I should like to have that fact presented. It seems to be an enormous undertaking and should be safely guarded.

Mr. ADAMSON. We consulted the departments, and their legal advisers, and we reached the conclusion that there was no danger of loss of any of the funds under existing provision of law, and we provided that once a year they should pay the balance into the Treasury, and we thought that to require them to make up a balance once a week or once a month and send it to Washington was a little cumbersome, in view of the security that we have under existing law, and it might result in having a shortage of supplies, in having to pay more, and might involve a loss of business. That is not the main desideratum, but it might discourage the patronage of that route. The object is not to run a business, but to induce custom to the canal.

Mr. RAKER. I want to agree with the gentleman on this proposition: The question is to get the most efficiency and the best work that can be done.

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. But ought not there to be some restraints and some restrictions, that somebody should have control of that matter? Let me call attention to the sentence on page 8, line 15:

> Monthly reports of such receipts and expenditures shall be made to the President by the person in charge, and annual reports shall be made to the Congress.

In the meantime nobody is to take any action on it.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not think you can do any better than to have monthly reports made, and then a provision that the surplus shall be paid into the Treasury once a year. That is ample security.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Are they not doing the same business there now?

Mr. ADAMSON. Of course.

Mr. BUCHANAN. What is the system and method of their doing the business now?

Mr. MANN. It is done through the Panama Railroad now.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Let me ask the gentleman from California if he can tell us what the difference is in respect to the matter under discussion and in the case of the sale of the public lands? Am I not right in saying that all the proceeds of public lands stand permanently appropriated to certain uses, the disposition of which is handled by the department?

Mr. MANN. For reclamation purposes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Ninety-five per cent of the proceeds of the sale of public lands stand appropriated to reclamation projects and the other 5 per cent to schools and road purposes, and Congress does not annually appropriate the receipts.

Mr. RAKER. That is not the condition here.

Mr. MANN. Well, do not let us run off on that track.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Is not that true?

Mr. MANN. It is true. If the gentleman will pardon me, I had something to do with the original framing of this law.

Mr. RAKER. If the gentleman from Illinois will pardon me, my object in asking these questions is to get at the purpose and intent of the legislation, so that we may intelligently vote and act on this matter.

Mr. MANN. This bill provides that the appliances, the buildings, or anything of that sort, may only be constructed out of the appropriations made by Congress. If you want to build a coal yard, Congress must first appropriate for it. But when it comes to the purchase and repurchase of coal for the supplying of passing vessels, you can not appropriate for that knowingly and intelligently a year or a year and a half ahead. Hence the bill provides that if you sell a thousand tons of coal to this vessel and receive the money for it, you can invest that money in the repurchase of more coal.

Mr. RAKER. Buy more coal?

Mr. MANN. Buy more coal and sell more coal and buy more coal and sell more coal.

Mr. ADAMSON. And report to Congress every month.

Mr. MANN. But you can not take the money and erect a building, or anything of that sort, because the bill requires that these things shall be constructed out of the money appropriated by Congress.

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman will allow me, I want to say that in the Post Office Department they spend $250,000,000 a year in this way. We do not have to reappropriate the money every time they want to buy a postage stamp.

Mr. HAMLIN. I want to say——

Mr. ADAMSON. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HAMLIN. I want to say that I betray no secret of the committee when I say that I raised the very proposition that the gentleman from California raises here. As a general proposition I am not in favor of the provision, but it came to the knowledge of the committee, and we were confronted with this fact, and this House is confronted with the fact, that we are opening up a new canal and a new route of transportation. It would certainly be to our advantage and the advantage of the Nation to get all the traffic through the canal possible. It also came to the knowledge of the committee, just as the chairman of the committee has so well said, that if we provide facilities for coaling and victualing the ships in the Canal Zone it would be a great inducement to all the ships of the world to patronize the canal, because they can use the space in the ships for freight and passengers. If they had to coal and victual from Liverpool, say, to San Francisco, they would necessarily have to use the additional space for that purpose, and that would exclude freight and passengers.

Then it was the judgment of the committee that it would be a great inducement to ships to patronize the canal if we provided facilities in the zone for them to recoal and revictual when they reached that point. As the gentleman from Illinois has said, if we appropriate money to buy coal we can not anticipate in advance the number of tons that will be sold during the next year or the victuals that will be required the next year. We can only make an estimate, and hence we provide that if we have not estimated sufficient coal for their needs we provide that they may take the money that they have received for what they sell and replenish the supply and report it monthly, and at the end of the year report to Congress.

It seems to me, while I do not like the idea as a general proposition, that it is the only feasible thing that we can do.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. And, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri has omitted his own suggestion—which is a very valuable one—not only at the end of the year shall we report to Congress, but to pay in all of the profits made during the year.

Mr. HAMLIN. Certainly, that was my suggestion; that whatever surplus there should be would go into the Treasury.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, the original question was that this very subject had been gone into, and because of its magnitude and because of the distance and because of the fact they must have money to buy and resell and buy again, this would be the safe way for the Government to get the best results for all concerned.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, this bill has been made up as a sort of growth. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] correctly states that he wrote this original proposition, and several other propositions in the bill; and when we came to consider them we conferred with the departments about it and got information everywhere we could, and we arrived at the best conclusion we could; and to arrive at the purposes to which the gentleman from California suggests, we want to do the best thing down there to handle the institution in the most profitable manner and induce the most custom from the ships of the world.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman from Georgia that I have watched his course since I have been here, which has been but a short time, and I watched it particularly upon this bill, and it seems to me that his purpose and object is to give the best results to the world, the United States, and to all concerned that can possibly be had. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I am very much obliged to the gentleman from California and I am going to say something good about him at the first opportunity. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Will that happen in this lifetime?

Mr. ADAMSON. Well, Uncle Joe, I have had the provocation, but I have not had the opportunity. He deserves it, undoubtedly.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Georgia has spoken of the different kinds of business that are to be carried on and of the establishments that are to be put into operation by the Government. The gentleman will recall the complaints that have been made by merchants and business men of the Isthmus, complaints to the effect that the Government is carrying on business in competition, unnecessarily so, with the business men of the Isthmus. Has the committee yielded in any measure to the demands made upon it by the merchants?

Mr. ADAMSON. Except to this extent: It gave a good deal of comfort and consolation by assuring the delegations who visited the committee upon that subject that after we had established our institutions there and put the canal in operation and prepared for the efficient supply of all the ships that sail that way, there would still be left, incidentally, for the merchants of Colon, infinitely more business than they had ever had before we went there.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I remember distinctly that when the representative of the board of trade was presenting his case to the committee he was asked if private capital would be ready to go into some of these enterprises, and he was prompt to assure the committee that the Beef Trust was ready to establish a cold-storage proposition there if the Government laid down the work.

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes; I have no doubt in the world that if the Government failed in its duty to establish a certainty of supply at reasonable prices, various trusts throughout the world existing or to come would immediately put up institutions and put up prices to the great detriment of our canal operation. The regular merchants to whom the gentleman referred were merchants of Colon who did not satisfy the committee that they would be able either to supply the demand of passing vessels or to hold the prices down in what they did supply, and the evidence has been before us in the hearings that the reason we had to establish these plants there to induce our own citizens and others to go there and work was that the regular supply was not sufficient in quantity, not sufficient in quality, not regular and certain, and far too exorbitant in price. It was a matter of necessity to build the canal, and it is infinitely more so to operate the canal and offer inducements to the world to take that route of travel.

Mr. STEPHENS of California. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman if there is anything in the bill or in the law which obligates the officials having charge of the Panama Canal Zone to sell for cash, or are promissory notes to be permitted to be taken?

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not know of any instance where officials are authorized to take notes for the Government.

Mr. STEPHENS of California. Would that be permitted under the law?

Mr. ADAMSON. If I were an official I would hate to take that risk.

Mr. STEPHENS of California. They would not be permitted to go into the credit business?

Mr. ADAMSON. I should think it would require express authority to go into the credit business.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, this bill does not provide for a continuation of the commissary, so called, does it?

Mr. ADAMSON. It provides that those things be supplied. The present plant, as the gentleman knows, can be enlarged or diminished at our pleasure.

Mr. BORLAND. Under the present arrangement the gentleman knows there is this cold-storage plant, a laundry, an ice-cream and coffee-roasting establishment, and then there is at each of the cities a general commissary where goods are sold at retail, everything from a paper of pins to grand pianos, for the employees of the zone. Now, this bill, as I understand it, preserves the power plant as to supplying sustenance for vessels, but makes no provision for a commissary. Is not that the case?

Mr. ADAMSON. Well, the gentleman has the language before him; I do not remember the details.

Mr. BORLAND. It was the commissary, as I recall, to which the merchants in Panama particularly objected.

Mr. ADAMSON. The only thing the bill seeks to do is to provide to passing ships the things necessary to prosecute their voyage. That is the thing we want to keep up in order to induce travel down there.

Mr. BORLAND. The commissary was a sort of retail store.

Mr. MANN. Such as ice, coal, meats, vegetables—those things that a vessel has to carry either in large bulk occupying space or in smaller bulk relying upon a retake.

Mr. BORLAND. The commissary sold garments, dress goods, household furniture, and all that sort of thing.

Mr. MANN. That is purely for the employees.

Mr. BORLAND. That has been done away with under the provisions of this bill?

Mr. ADAMSON. I think not.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ADAMSON. I do.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. I do not know how seriously the gentleman intended his expression, that if the Government did not make certain provisions for these supplies the Beef Trust and other trusts possibly would come in and ultimately control the supplies and raise the prices. Is any of this legislation predicated in the bill upon any such apprehension?

Mr. ADAMSON. Well, I was answering the question some gentleman asked me, and I always act on Josh Billings's advice, that when he was not under oath about a particular matter and he found out what advice the man wanted he gave him such as he thought would please him. The gentleman made his speech and I thought I would answer him in the same vein. I do not know any particular trust that contemplates debouching on us down there at all; I do not know which one, but we are all satisfied that if we do not make arrangements to supply the passing vessels with all these commodities that they need to prosecute their voyages, there will be an accumulation of money that will make provision there, that will take advantage of their necessities rather than supply their needs by raising prices while they render the supply uncertain, and it might impair the enticement or weaken the enticement we are striving to offer to vessels to go via Panama. [Applause.]

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Will the laws prohibiting these things be more susceptible to violation by parties there than here?

Mr. ADAMSON. While you are bringing one of these suits you might lose tolls on a great many vessels.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. If the gentleman will permit, I spoke as I did because I had read and heard of a statement made by a representative of the business men of Panama before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce at Colon or at Panama. The representative was complaining that the Government of the United States entered into and was carrying on a business that seriously interfered with what they said was the legitimate business of the merchants who resided on the Isthmus; and the representative was asked by a member of the committee in case the Government decided to give up some of the enterprises it had established and was carrying on if private capital would be allowed and would be able to take them up. The representative said yes; that it was suggested a short time before that the cold-storage plant be given up and the Government cease to carry it on, and that the merchants of Colon, or some one representing them, had at once received a communication from the Armour Co. and others, whom I understand are considered to be the Beef Trust of the country, offering to furnish the money to carry on that work. That is why I said I did not want to speak of the bogie trusts that frighten some people so much.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will permit, speaking of cold storage and the Beef Trust and all the other kinds of trusts, which I am not responsible for, I want to ask the gentleman if, in the purchase of provisions and putting them in our cold-storage plant necessary to carry on the construction of the canal, did we patronize the infernal Beef Trust, or is it not true that every pound of meat was bought under a contract and substantially came from the wicked packers in the United States; and if so, should not somebody be impeached? [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, with compliments to the gentleman on his descriptive language, and leaving him to rejoice in his own conclusions, I have to reply to him that we have done the very best we could under the circumstances every time. And if the gentlemen who constitute the trusts, so called, have us by the umbilicus and bring us to our knees and cause us trouble, even when we let out and invite contracts, I can only remind the gentleman that under present circumstances the delays of the courts, the law's delays, the differences of opinion as to what is a trust and who is a trust, and who wants to fight trusts, and who is against the trusts, and who is for the trusts, reminds me of an old lady in my town who was sick, and the preacher visited her very often to give her consolation. She claimed to have more religion than he did, and I have no doubt it is true. He asked her one day, "My dear sister, what in all of your Christian experience is the most consoling and comforting passage in that wonderful book, the Bible?" She replied to him, "I believe the most consoling and comforting passage in that book is, 'Grin and bear it.'" [Laughter.]

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. We all know how frank the chairman of this committee is, and I simply want to put in an injection here to help him out of a little bit of a hole that I think he has gotten into. The gentleman is not in favor of the Government going generally into the commercial business, is he?

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not think that is the object.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Is it not a fact that it is simply the exigencies of the occasion that require the Government to go into the commercial business to the limited extent of victualing these vessels that make there and coal there, so far as the gentleman from Illinois says, in the purchase of vegetables, and so forth? But, generally speaking, the gentleman is not in favor of the Government going into a commercial business against those who are in the commercial business down there and handling commodities that they may be able to sell to these passing vessels? Is not that true?

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I have tried several times to give expression to what I thought was substantially the idea advanced by my distinguished friend from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER]. My infelicity of expression, perhaps, ought to be my only apology for not making it clear. But I thank the gentleman and appreciate his more expert use of the mother tongue, and thank him for giving expression to what I have always regarded as a fundamental doctrine, namely, that it was not the prime purpose in the creation of the American Government either to meddle with or compete with everybody's business, but run governmental affairs, and only incidentally do the things which the gentleman from Colorado says are made necessary by an exigency like this.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Only one word, Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman. I would not have said what I did except for the fact that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] said that the commissary departments throughout the Army, and so forth, were in competition with civilians. Now, that is not true, because a civilian can not buy anything at an Army post from the commissary department.

Mr. ADAMSON. They are not supposed to do so down there.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman evidently has not read either the law or the bills relating to the military establishment.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I know in certain cases, for instance, where there is a famine of coal, or where there is a famine of something, that the department has allowed civilians to buy from an Army post, but otherwise not. Now, the Government is running the commissaries down there for the benefit of the employees, and to that extent it is a departure from the rule that the Government shall not go into the commercial business.

Now, one other suggestion. I would not have said so, but that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] said also that these merchants in the zone would be after the Government to supply to these passing vessels all the things they needed, and then have a greater trade than they ever had before. I submit that is not an answer to it, and that the frank way to meet this question is that it is by the exigencies of the occasion that the Government be allowed to sell some few articles to these passing vessels.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman from Colorado is correct, Mr. Chairman, as to the use of the word "exigency." I believe it is an exigency requiring us to supply these things. Ships would not use that route unless they knew in advance just what supplies and accommodations they could secure. And no announcement from any individual would satisfy those ships, even if it were given in advance. But if the management of the canal, under the authority of the United States Government, announces that those supplies are there ready and at reasonable prices, to furnish to all on the same conditions and terms, there is a certainty there, and we can not get along without certainty. [Applause.]

Now I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is not the real answer to the question propounded by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] as to the Government purchasing those supplies from the Meat Trust, this: That no one individual butcher, no one ordinary provision dealer could, under the circumstances, provide regularly the quantity of meat and supplies that are necessary for so large a body of men as are now on the Isthmus? Was not such a large combination necessary in order that the men might be properly supplied with food, and the work go on?

Mr. ADAMSON. The element of uncertainty would have been left in that condition, and we can not afford to have that.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the next section provides for the civil administration of the canal, section 7, and the establishment of the inferior courts to take the place of the present ones. The committee in the remaining portions of the bill attempted, having put the canal in successful operation, as we hope, up to this point, to do something that would not have been necessary if we had not provided for the abolition of the present organization, which would carry the present courts out of existence when the Canal Commission is dismissed. Therefore we deemed it necessary to go ahead and provide for a new administration, to come into power when the old one was discontinued. Therefore we provided as simply as we could that the governor of the Panama Canal should exercise the functions of the civil government; that the zone should be divided up into magistrates' courts, with one of the few towns in each subdivision, and that enough magistrates and constables should be appointed to serve those courts.

In a subsequent section——

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that point?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. ADAMSON. Certainly.

Mr. FOWLER. I discover that you give the magistrates jurisdiction in civil cases to the amount of $300, and in criminal cases you do not in this bill give them the power to impose a fine above $25. I can not quite understand the reason for making that distinction, and I would be glad to have the gentleman explain that, if he will kindly do so.

Mr. ADAMSON. Ordinarily those matters would depend on the judgment of different individuals in reaching a conclusion, but in this case we adopted that because it is the existing law down there. We did not make any changes as to the criminal offenses. As to civil jurisdiction we made the change. We raised the jurisdiction.

Mr. FOWLER. Do not you think if you raised the criminal jurisdiction of that court above $25 to $300, as in civil cases, it would relieve the district court also?

Mr. ADAMSON. Well, the committee thought that cases above that should be tried in the superior courts.

Mr. FOWLER. Why did you not provide for trial by jury, so that both civil and criminal cases could be tried before a justice's court by jury?

Mr. ADAMSON. It was just a matter of judgment with us. We thought when the magistrate got through the civil case below $300, if the party wanted to appeal he could take it to the district court.

Mr. FOWLER. Does not the gentleman think it would be better to the individual litigant to give him the right of trial by jury in the justice's court, if he sees fit to require it, and not put him to the trouble of going to the district court in order to get a trial by jury, entailing upon him additional expense and cost? The litigant might be a poor man, and the gentleman knows the justice's court is the poor man's court.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is a matter of judgment that gentlemen may differ about. Of course, we do not expect to have much litigation down there at all. We do not expect to have anybody but American citizens of high class. We do not expect them to have that kind of trouble that mean folks have. We do not expect to have anybody there but the employees and their families.

Mr. FOWLER. I trust that the gentleman, in his wisdom, has seen through the situation and that it will turn out that way and that that territory will blossom like the rose and flourish like a trust. [Laughter.]

Mr. ADAMSON. We have tried to do the best we could, but I suppose there may be errors and imperfections in the bill that ought to be corrected.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. The State of Tennessee is one of those States of the Union where the magistrates have jurisdiction of cases on notes and bonds as high as $1,000, and in other cases as high as $500, and no jury trial at all—and that is in the United States.

Mr. FOWLER. Does the gentleman think it is good policy?

Mr. SIMS. It works very finely. If the litigant wants to appeal the case, he can do so.

Mr. FOWLER. The gentleman means that a man in a justice's court can not get a trial by jury unless it is on an appeal after being defeated?

Mr. SIMS. Yes; and taking an appeal without giving bond.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will state to the gentleman that this district court sits at two places, and it will not be far away from the litigant who wants to make an appeal.

Mr. FOWLER. I understand. I was trying to get at the reason for the discrimination between the jurisdiction of the justice's court in civil cases and criminal cases, so far as the imposing of the amount of fine is concerned.

Mr. ADAMSON. We had to draw the line somewhere, and we agreed upon that amount.

Mr. FOWLER. And there was no particular reason for making that discrimination?

Mr. ADAMSON. One reason was that it is the present law.

Mr. FOWLER. I believe the gentleman said that. Would not the gentleman agree to an amendment in this bill giving the right of trial by jury in the justice's court if an individual requested it?

Mr. ADAMSON. If this House voted it, I would agree to it.

Mr. FOWLER. Does the chairman of this committee, in his wisdom, have any objection to that?

Mr. ADAMSON. I think we have got it in about as good fix as we can get it.

Mr. FOWLER. I do not want to amend the gentleman's bill, and if I ever get an opportunity I am going to nominate him for Secretary of the Navy, because I think he has done such good work in this bill, but I am trying to get at the right of the individual to have a trial by jury whenever he demands it.

Mr. ADAMSON. I am much obliged to the gentleman, but if it is all the same to him, when he gets ready to give me a good job, I wish he would let me select the job. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOWLER. I never expect to have the opportunity to select a job, but I am always ready to assist the gentleman in soliciting whatever job he may want, because I think he is worthy of whatever he asks.

Mr. ADAMSON. I thank the gentleman, but my colleagues here are so clever and good to me that I would rather stay in Congress than be connected with the Navy. It always makes me seasick to go on the water, and I could not conscientiously discharge my duties as Secretary of the Navy without looking into the details of the whole business.

Mr. FOWLER. It does not appear that the gentleman has ever been seasick while considering this bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will have to say something good about the gentleman from Illinois the next chance I get.

Mr. MANN. When we took control down there, the civil law, the Spanish law, being in force, there was no trial by jury at all for any criminal offense. By order of the President, trial by jury was allowed in felony cases, and when a former Panama bill passed the House in the last Congress, the House inserted the provision that in criminal prosecutions for felonies there should be the right of trial by jury. Perhaps it ought to be extended, although probably down there it would not work very well in the trial of these small offenses.

As I understand the bill, it authorizes the President to divide the Canal Zone into magistrate's subdivisions. Does the gentleman construe that that would authorize the President afterwards to resubdivide it?

Mr. ADAMSON. That was the intention, unless Congress provided differently. The whole matter——

Mr. MANN. It seems to me that ought to be clearly provided here, because if we are to acquire the land in the zone, the magistrate's subdivisions that may be needed now may not be needed after we acquire the land and devote it to other purposes.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman will notice, he will find that that section also authorizes the President to determine what towns shall exist. The old towns will be mainly flooded and swept away.

Mr. MANN. I understand.

Mr. ADAMSON. The President is to select what towns are to be allowed to exist, and accompanying that is the additional exercise of power by him to lay out the subdivisions, with a town in each one, and I would construe that to be a continuing power in the President, to create a subdivision whenever and wherever necessary; and if that involves the necessity of changing the boundary of a subdivision I should think it would be incidental to the other power.

Mr. MANN. It says:

And subdivide said Canal Zone into subdivisions to be designated by name or number.

Mr. ADAMSON. I have no objection.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is clearly of the opinion that after these conditions are changed there the magistrate's divisions will probably want to be different from what they are now?

Mr. ADAMSON. If that is not clear, it ought to be made so, of course.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest to the chairman of the committee that possibly if this bill has the effect of turning the Canal Zone into a military reservation and excluding practically all population from it except employees, none of these courts may be needed, and instead of the provisions not being broad enough, the committee may have gone into more particularity than the results will require. This bill requires that there shall be a magistrate's court in each town that is established. Now, the word "town" under those circumstances would not mean a commercial center. It would not mean a place where there was a collection of citizens engaged in private business. It might mean possibly one at Gatun and one at Paraiso or Pedro Miguel, and none others, except at Balboa and Cristobal, and it is possible that there are more courts provided than would be needed.

Mr. ADAMSON. Does the gentleman think if we had one on our hands we could not get rid of it?

Mr. BORLAND. If this bill becomes a sort of organic law, which requires certain courts, instead of leaving it to the President to create them when necessary, to that extent you limit the power of the President to make those regulations.

Mr. ADAMSON. I hardly think there is much trouble in that suggestion. I do not apprehend that the President will permit a town to be located and named unless in such a place as all conditions would promise permanency, and then around that make a district for the court. But that whole matter will be left to Congress. Congress will be here, and I hope most of us will be here, and anything further necessary to be done can be done.

Mr. BORLAND. I have no doubt the gentleman from Georgia will be here.

Mr. ADAMSON. It will be two or three years, anyway, before the canal is put in operation, and anything necessary can be attended to before that time.

Mr. BORLAND. I want to say that I do not believe in the military reservation theory. I believe that we will have commercial towns there and that Congress ought to legislate on a wider scale than is contemplated in this bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not think the gentleman from Missouri has used the name that I gave. I do not call it a military reservation; I call it a canal zone. The Government of the United States is going to run that canal, and, incidentally, it is going to use the zone as an adjunct for canal purposes. The Government of the United States in conducting that canal will use it for war purposes when necessary, and the United States Government, I hope, will have a long period of peace in which commerce may use the canal to the great profit of the United States Treasury.

Mr. BORLAND. I concur fully in that hope, that we may use it forty years in peace to one of war.

Mr. KOPP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. With pleasure.

Mr. KOPP. The courts provided for here are to be permanent courts for all time.

Mr. ADAMSON. I think they will last until we change them. I do not think that any other nation will ever change them until we get ready.

Mr. KOPP. Well, what I meant to say was that these courts are not established for a temporary purpose.

Mr. ADAMSON. No; although they are established subject to a modification by Congress.

Mr. KOPP. Oh, certainly. Section 8 provides that "the rules of practice in such district courts shall be prescribed or amended by order of the President."

Mr. ADAMSON. That does not relate to statutory procedure. The statutory procedure is in the law and will be made applicable to these courts.

Mr. KOPP. I wanted the gentleman to explain what he meant by the language.

Mr. ADAMSON. There are always, as the gentleman knows, in every court rules that are not embodied in a statute.

Mr. KOPP. But they are usually prescribed by the judges themselves.

Mr. ADAMSON. These will probably be prepared by the judge or by the Attorney General, but signed by the President.

Mr. KOPP. What is the object of having the President do it? It is almost the unbroken practice to have the courts establish for themselves the rules of practice.

Mr. ADAMSON. The answer is that since we started to build the canal—and I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is the only Member present on the committee with me at that time—we set out with the idea of making the President the executive officer responsible for the administration of everything on that zone. This committee did not want to connect it with any department of the Government, and the gentleman will notice that in writing the bill we have not connected it with any department wherever we could help it. We make the President responsible for everything and always have, and in preserving the symmetry of the bill and his sole responsibility, we require that the President shall sign the order to establish these rules. We expect the President to refer the question to the Attorney General, and then he will sign the order.

Mr. KOPP. But in providing a system in general for administrative matters that is absolutely correct. But when you are to establish a permanent branch of the judiciary coexistent with the district courts of the United States, it seems to me ill advised to provide that the rules and practices of the court should be in any wise under the direction of the executive department. They should be controlled by the same rules as other branches of the judiciary and established by the judges themselves.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. This is one of the matters referred to as continuing, in my judgment, the government of one man in the Canal Zone. I notice in that same section the admiralty jurisdiction of the court is to be the procedure and practice of the United States district courts.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is statutory.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee, who has given such an interesting series of answers to all of these questions, if he can tell me why it was that the committee did not adopt for the district court in the Canal Zone the laws or practice of the United States districts courts? If he will remember, that is substantially the proposition I made to the committee several years ago. In the magistrate's court, in view of the facts that developed that the zone will be practically bare of permanent population, I can conceive that this is a proper form of government.

But when it comes with questions such as felonies committed upon the Canal Zone, or with suits for civil damages for accidents in the canal, does it not seem to the chairman of the committee that it would have been wiser to adopt and apply to the Canal Zone the laws and the practice and the procedure of the United States district courts which were all familiar to us and which were on hand and entirely applicable?

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, as I stated to the gentleman, in answer to his other question about the magistrate courts, the procedure and practice of the circuit courts is already established by law on the zone. These provisions at present are not so material to practitioners here as they are to practitioners there. The practitioners there are familiar with the present statutes and laws. We legalized the old court in section 2, and in this section we abolish it and substitute the district court for the circuit court, and in a subsequent section we transfer all cases and jurisdiction to the court having like jurisdiction, which is this new district court, and we provide, as you will read, that the procedure and practice shall be the same. As I stated to the gentleman before, we did not have time now, two or three years in advance of the taking effect of this system, to revise all of this code of law. Congress will be here until that time and will have plenty of time to do that. We simply provide, if the President himself makes the change in the courts before Congress has had time to revise that code of law, that the old procedure now existing shall prevail until the change is made.

Mr. RAKER. If you would make that provision here, then there would be no question about it.

Mr. ADAMSON. Section 1 says until Congress shall otherwise provide.

Mr. RAKER. Let me read this to the gentleman.

Mr. ADAMSON. I have said in another place, until Congress shall otherwise provide, and if we had not said that, it would have been that way in any event.

Mr. RAKER. The rules of practice in such district court shall be prescribed or amended by order of the President.

Mr. ADAMSON. That does not mean a statutory procedure, but it means such incidental rules as the court may adopt, and they are simply rules of the court.

Mr. RAKER. I appreciate that. The rules adopted by the Supreme Court for the district courts are rules of practice of the court, and they are not statutory provisions.

Mr. ADAMSON. It is not even contemplated that the present rules of practice shall be changed unless it is necessary to add something to them in some way.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Certainly.

Mr. FOWLER. Does not the judge of the court now have the power, and is it not the practice that he prescribes the rules governing the trial of cases in his court, or rather, governing his court and the manner in which he shall get at trials?

Mr. ADAMSON. If he does it, he does it under Executive order signed by the President.

Mr. FOWLER. Does not the district court do that now?

Mr. ADAMSON. There is not anything done there now except on the basis of an Executive order.

Mr. FOWLER. Is that all there is there now?

Mr. ADAMSON. That is all that there has been there since the Fifty-eighth Congress.

Mr. FOWLER. Is not that a matter of legislating by an Executive order?

Mr. ADAMSON. It was; but we had no law for it except that we bought and paid for the Isthmus and we gave the power to the President.

Mr. FOWLER. Does not the gentleman think we ought to change that and give that power to the court?

Mr. ADAMSON. We are going to when we get time. We have not yet had the time. We are just now providing to open the canal.

Mr. FOWLER. Why not substitute the words "the courts" instead of the word "President"?

Mr. ADAMSON. For the reason that I gave to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KOPP] that inasmuch as we had to trust somebody down there, we thought we would hold the President responsible for everything. It is symmetrical.

Mr. Chairman, I believe before I have gotten to it, of my own accord, that I have already been brought by other gentlemen to a discussion of the next section. I have also, in answer to questions, discussed section 9, which abolishes the district courts and transfers the jurisdiction. Section 10 has been already referred to by two or three gentlemen, and I have answered them. It prohibits trespassing on the Canal Zone or any injury or damage in any way to the locks. That prohibits anybody without authority being on the zone after the canal is open.

Mr. FOWLER. May not American citizens go there?

Mr. ADAMSON. Oh, yes; they will be given permission. We will give permission to everybody who ought to go there. There will be no trouble about that.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Is the gentleman now discussing section 10?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. It just occurred to me to suggest whether it would not be advisable to except the ports at either end of the canal so as to permit persons to be within the defined boundaries of Cristobal and Balboa without written permission.

Mr. ADAMSON. We discussed that in the committee, and we concluded it would be easier just to issue a proclamation on the subject when necessary. We would rather exclude everybody and then admit those we want.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I feel bound by the action of the committee in the matter, being a member of it, but this is one of the provisions of the bill about which I have not been so clear—the exclusion of everybody from all parts of the zone unless they are employees of the Government or have a written permit from the governor to be within the zone.

Mr. ADAMSON. Well, I do not think it says written permission, does it?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. But, if the gentleman pleases, for instance, a man would not have the right to get off a ship——

Mr. ADAMSON. You are mistaken about that.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado (continuing). Without a written permission, as he would be within the zone; and if he got off, say, at Balboa, which is the Pacific port of entry, and started to walk up the street, he would be a trespasser.

Mr. ADAMSON. I think not. I think if we invite him to come and pay toll to go through he is there by our permission.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I just made the suggestion as it occurred to me.

Mr. ADAMSON. I think it a great deal easier, if the gentleman from Colorado will permit, to establish a general rule and then use our discretion about what we shall do as to admissions.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question in that connection?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. This is an entirely new proposition?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Where does it come from, if I may be permitted to ask?

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not know whether anybody started it before I did or not, but I have been talking for it for 15 years, and Col. Goethals has been talking about it before the committee for some time.

Mr. MANN. I will not dispute the gentleman has been talking about it for 15 years, but I have been more intimate with the gentleman in connection with the Panama Canal than any other person, and I am sure I never heard him mention it before.

Mr. ADAMSON. I have said it 100 times.

Mr. MANN. I do not see how it is workable.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will try to show the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to giving the widest latitude of authority to somebody on the zone to keep people out. It may be desirable to do that by express law, but I do not see how it is possible to say that no one shall be in the zone without they get permission from somewhere all the time as a general proposition.

Mr. ADAMSON. Well, I do. Has the gentleman from Colorado another question?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I believe not, but I think if such action as a proclamation of the governor is necessary to allow people to disembark from a ship and walk up the street of one of the ports of entry that is something we ought to look after in the substantive law.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not think there is any trouble about it.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Has not the United States title to the land of the Canal Zone as well as jurisdiction over it?

Mr. ADAMSON. We have passed that section. We own most of the land now, but there is a little of it to which we have not acquired title. Of course we had jurisdiction over all of it, but not the title to all, and we have already passed the section in the bill authorizing the President to acquire title to the balance. What does the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] say to the other provision of the section in regard to the injury of locks—that men shall not have the privilege of going upon the canal for the purpose of injuring the locks?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I had in mind a moment ago, while making my suggestion about trespassing, the idea that the provisions for protection of the locks could not be too rigid. I do not think that persons ought to be given the opportunity to do the irreparable damage that could be so easily done to the locks, but I submit, further, that the locks are the only part of the canal that could be injured by a person or any number of persons within the zone.

Mr. ADAMSON. We think an ounce of preventive may be better than a good deal of cure or punishment or reparation. We think that if these people are able to account for themselves there will be less danger of having the locks blown up.

Mr. BORLAND. Would not the locks more likely be injured by a man in an airship than on foot?

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not know about that. There are a lot of possibilities. The ways that are dark and the tricks that are vain of evildoers are multitudinous and multifarious and limitless in their inventive genius. Section 12——

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman yield at that point? Possibly the gentleman may have covered it before, but is it not true that the conclusion of the committee was that the zone would not be populated except by officers and employees of the canal, soldiers, and so forth, to police the canal?

Mr. ADAMSON. We except all that expressly.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is what I say. A great part of the Canal Zone could not be used for agricultural purposes on account of the lakes, and it would be mostly used for that purpose; toward the two ends——

Mr. ADAMSON. We are talking of trespassing.

Mr. HAMLIN. The balance is hills, and so forth, and there is no inducement for anybody to go there to make a home for himself unless he goes to either the Atlantic or Pacific end of the canal for commercial purposes. If that be true, he can get permission covering agriculture under this bill. The purpose of this is to prevent idle trespassers on the canal, who might be there for some unlawful purpose, and it is very difficult to make an exception to the rule.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The Panama Railroad is to be operated by the Government after the canal is constructed, as I understand it?

Mr. HAMLIN. Whenever it is needed.

Mr. MANN. And it will run from Colon to Panama?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I have always assumed that many people going through the canal would prefer to get off the vessel at Colon, for instance, and go over on the railroad, a short ride, to Panama, and be there a few hours, and take the vessel from there; but under this provision they could not do it without getting permission.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think the gentleman is entirely in error. I think the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] is entirely right in saying that any passenger coming by ship to the canal is invited there by the Government, and no court in Christendom, much less on the Canal Zone, would convict any man for being on that zone who is a passenger there and wanted to go over on the railroad.

Mr. MANN. Then a man who wanted to do mischief would be able to sail down there, and could do what he pleased.

Mr. HAMLIN. I concede that; but let us throw all the safeguards around it that we can.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman who is invited to go there is invited to go through on the vessel that passes through the canal, and he is not invited to get off, and you do put a penal provision here against his going on the Canal Zone.

Mr. ADAMSON. We will print on all those railroad tickets that he has permission to ride.

Mr. HAMLIN. So far as doing damage is concerned, I will call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to the fact that he might do damage although he remained a passenger on the boat.

Mr. MANN. That is true.

Mr. HAMLIN. We want to do the best we can to protect the canal.

Mr. MANN. I appreciate what the gentleman desires. I will not move to strike it out, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. ADAMSON. Section 12 carries out the treaty as to extradition of criminals. Section 13 provides that when war is imminent the governor of the Panama Canal shall be subject in all respects touching the operation of the canal or the jurisdiction of the Canal Zone to the Army officer designated by the President for that purpose. And section 14 names this as the "Panama Canal act."

Mr. HARDY. Does the gentleman intend to discuss section 11?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes, sir; but not right now.

Mr. HARDY. I notice the gentleman skipped it.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I have stated to the House the details of the bill, shown its framework, and so far as I thought necessary the details, and have tried to answer good humoredly, if not satisfactorily, all questions that my colleagues have asked me. I have passed by two sections, and if I may have the attention of the committee for a few minutes, I will allude briefly to those sections. The first one is the toll proposition—section 5. That provides that the President shall fix and change tolls as often as necessary. The committee has not felt it was able, nor that Congress will be able, arbitrarily to fix tolls that would work to the satisfaction of the Government. We have several competitors for business down there. If we are to get any of the present business away from the Suez Canal, some of it may depend on tolls, though I have not myself been very optimistic as to the amount of the present traffic through the Suez Canal that we would be able to secure. There is what is called a zone, or batch, of traffic that the Suez Canal under normal conditions will hold. There is another portion that naturally and normally the Panama route would hold. There is a very small and very poorly defined, and perhaps indefinable, twilight zone of competition between the two. The Tehuantepec competition will be entirely eliminated, I believe, under almost any view we may take.

The Suez Canal, being owned by a French company under a concession from the Government of Egypt, and being guaranteed by some 15 or 16 European nations, the stock being owned by the leading commercial men of the leading nations of Europe, it stands to reason that, conditions being equal, those who are the virtual owners of that canal, and who in paying toll to that canal would be simply putting money in one of their pockets and taking it out of the other, would patronize that canal in preference to ours. The prospective volume of business at the Panama Canal is at present pure speculation. It is guesswork. We have had some eminent statisticians, and doctrinaries—and I do not use the word offensively—figuring on it, investigating it, but the best thing they do is to make suppositions and then base conclusions on suppositions. Some of them for one purpose figure out large business in order to show that we can afford to give away something to somebody. Some of them figure out large business in order to make us feel good about our investment and to feel good themselves. Some of them figure out large business because they want a large business, and it pleases them. Some figure it out because they actually believe it, and they take their own suggestions and pass them around and have them repeated by somebody else, and bandied back and forth until they become authority. Great propagandas on many other causes are carried forward in that same way. I know there is a great deal of business now going through the Suez Canal that we can not get. I can not understand how a Government that owns 30 per cent or more of the stock of the Suez Canal, and a number of other Governments who own all the balance of that stock, and who are directors in it, would give up that route from northern Europe to the Far East in order to come across a route almost as far, and in some cases farther, and pay tolls to us on our canal. That is a reasonable suggestion.

That is a reasonable suggestion. Of course northern Europe can reach the western coast of the United States through the Panama Canal easily. It can reach the northern part of the west coast of South America. The west coast of North America and the north coast of South America can reach the European ports in shorter sailing. As to the far eastern business people generally talk about Japan—and I do not want to scare anybody, or raise any yellow peril, or anything of that kind—but Japan can come across and go through the Panama Canal and go to the Atlantic coast of the United States more cheaply and quickly than by any other route. There is no doubt that there will be some business there.

It is estimated by experts that it costs about 10 cents a net ton per mile for a ship to sail, so that without getting lost in geographical figures, which are a mere matter of detail and which I do not want to bother about, any of you can figure out from the map or the globe the probable diversion as affected by the tolls on these different routes. But the proposition I make and lay down is that, the conditions being nearly equal, those who are virtually owners of the Suez Canal will patronize that canal in preference to the Panama Canal.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him right on that point?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. The gentleman spoke of Japan. Is it not true that from Yokohama to New York by way of the Suez Canal and by way of the Panama Canal there is only a difference of about 18 miles?

Mr. ADAMSON. Well, it occurs to me that Japan not owning any interest in either canal would take the one that was cheapest and quickest.

Mr. HAMLIN. But from Japan to one of the particularly important points—New York—it would be a toss-up, and that would be uncertain?

Mr. ADAMSON. That would be in the twilight zone; the competitive zone.

Now, so far as the Suez Canal is concerned, we know what that rate would be. We know that the tolls are now about $1.31 per net ton, and I believe, on the average, a net ton is space enough to hold about 2 tons of freight, or 2 freight tons.

Now, the Suez rate being at present $1.31½, or about that, and knowing that the order is that the rate will be lowered to $1, we know that by the time of the opening of the Panama Canal we can not hope to divert from the Suez Canal any of her business if we charge over $1 per net registered ton.

There is another thing to consider in that. The way they measure it over there is that they count more space on the ship than we do on ours, about one-fifth more, so that in reality, according to the way they measure most of their ships and the way we measure our ships of commerce, about 80 cents charged by our canal would be equal to their rate of $1, whenever it reaches $1, and it will reach that before very long. That question of amount we leave to the President to watch and determine and to change from time to time.

I have already stated that we think that the Tehuantepec route is taken out of the deal entirely. Their charges to foreign ships heretofore have been one-third of the freight that the ships charge for their voyage.

The other competitors are the railroads. There is one of them, I believe, in South America. There is the Straits of Magellan route, which Chile and the Argentine Republic try to say they preserve the neutralization of. The route around the Horn, of course, is what we are trying to eliminate and remove the necessity for—some 10,000 miles difference from the northern Pacific points to the middle and Atlantic points between going around through the Straits of Magellan and going through the canal. So the matter that the people dread most is the competition with the railroads. The question is, Will the transcontinental railroads, which are accused of having opposed and delayed the construction of the canal so long, manage to prevent business going through the canal? Of course that depends on conditions. We think the evidence shows that the freight rates through the canal may be so low if honest conduct is maintained in the fixing of freight rates through the canal that it will be impossible for the railroads to compete as to most of the freight. That is one of the things that it is necessary for the President to study and understand. There is one consideration that must not be lost sight of. If there were a zone of competitive business that we could secure by reducing the tolls, we might reduce thereby the tolls on the business of which we were sure, so as to lose more income on that than we gained by reducing low enough to secure the competitive business.

I am discussing this as a representative of the United States of America with a view to operating an institution that belongs to the Government of the United States, that the Government of the United States is paying for out of the Treasury, and from which the Government of the United States has the right to derive money to return to its Treasury in order to reduce its expenditures.

I do not regard this great enterprise as entered upon for the sole purpose of carrying out the objects or forwarding the particular interests of any set of men or any class of men. If there is any kind of business in this country which is unprofitable, if there is any kind of business which is so necessary to the public that the people as a whole or the Government ought to contribute to its support and prosperity, the people are here all the time, and Congress is here most all the time of late. We ought to adopt a direct, square, honest method, and go at it in a separate bill and not attempt to hang it around the neck of this great enterprise on which we have expended so much money and on which the hopes of the world so largely depend. We ought to be allowed to open it, to consider the charges and customs of our competitors, to study the way to secure the business for that canal, and we ought to be allowed to run it in that way; and as the canal proceeds in its operation, and we see what business it does and how much profits are being returned, then it will be time enough for the United States to take into consideration any diversion of its receipts or any other incidental use to make of the canal or of the income therefrom.

Now, at the outset, when we were considering this canal, the very first proposition I heard in this House, when the bill was first up for a Nicaraguan Canal, was that the Isthmian Canal should be used to restore the American merchant marine to the sea. Well, in God's name, I believe in the American merchant marine. I think we ought to have all the ships we need. I think somebody ought to build them and run them. I think the people ought to patronize them. I think we ought to have them as we had them in the days of yore, when, like the wagoner, we could get a load both ways, and it paid to haul, and we sent out ships to every port, to every sea throughout the world.

I should love to see that again; but, gentlemen, can we not devise other means, if it is a failing industry, if it needs help, if it can not stand alone, if the Government must take it up and support it because it is unprofitable or because it does not pay profits enough? Why can not Congress devise some other means? Why can we not let this enterprise alone and operate the canal for the benefit of this Government and the benefit of mankind, and introduce some other bills to take care of American shipping? I would be glad to see you provide some other means to increase American exports. I should be glad to have some gentleman introduce a bill, and I should be glad to see Congress pass it, that every American bottom that goes to a foreign country laden with American exports and comes back laden with foreign goods in exchange therefor shall have those foreign goods admitted at a reduced rate of duty. That would not violate any favored-nation clause. It would not violate any treaty about the canal. It would not be treating anybody in the United States dishonestly. It would not be hampering a great enterprise by taking tolls from the Treasury that belong there according to the law and giving them to a particular interest. There is no trouble about that. There is another way it might be done. It is not my duty in advocating this bill to usurp the functions of other committees and tell them the way they ought to do these things. I am protesting against hampering our project, hanging a millstone around our necks by making us take care of their pet projects and their special interests, when they ought to do it in other ways if it is right to be done at all. I have suggested one way. That would not only help the ship-subsidy folks, without being called a subsidy, but it would help the American people. It would help American exports. It would help you send your products abroad. It would help you to buy goods cheaper.

If gentlemen want to do something to help the special interests of the ship industry, let them couple it with a plan to help the people, too. If these people will give a guaranty of cheaper rates, which they have never done in human experience, so that people will have the benefit of the reduced tolls, suppose they adopt the zone and commodity system. It is easy, without any violation of these clauses in the treaty, to adopt a zone system where you know the necessaries of life are produced which our people need, and say that ships loaded with them may come through at reduced rates. Gentlemen might say that that was a subterfuge, but it is not; it is open and aboveboard. It is legal, because in Russia and China the same things might be produced, but in practice would not be carried through the canal. These people would load with the things that we ourselves produce here. But, gentlemen, the only ships that they want to help are not the foreign ships, the only ships that the minority of the committee talk about are the coastwise ships, the ships already the most highly protected of any interest on earth. They have a monopoly of the coastwise trade of this country, whose commerce is greater than that of the commerce of all of the rest of the world put together, the commerce of the people that do more traveling and more commercial business than any nation on the face of the earth. They have as protection that no foreign-registered ship shall touch their business at all. They have it all.

I am not opposed to that. Some Members of our Congress are. Some want to invite the world into our domestic commerce. I do not, for this reason: Not that I want to enrich these people, none of whom are suffering, but because I do not want foreigners to do our domestic business. I want our own people to do our domestic business, and all the regret I have is that the rule is not now sufficiently conformed to, from what I learn.

Now, the coastwise trade had a great many witnesses before the committee. Some of them were good, high-toned men. It developed in these hearings that these men were not suffering; they were doing their business and making it profitable. They were building ships, but they had developed a practice which goes to show that no amount of tolls of the canal will affect their business or their charges to the people at all. They would scorn a combination. They would not be guilty of entering into a trust; by no means. But they are the most courteous and prudent gentlemen on the face of the earth; when one establishes a line between two ports, the others let him alone. [Laughter.] And if another company starts a new coastwise-ship line, it opens it between two other ports. When it was developed before the committee that the American-Hawaiian Line was able to go into the coastwise business and do every bit of the business through the canal that the Pacific coast would offer, we asked one of these coastwise gentlemen, who with great courtesy and prudence abstain from meddling with anybody else's rights, if he could not go through the canal and interfere with the Hawaiian Line and compete with it. He said that he did not think it would be good business. If that is the course that is to be taken, what is the use for us to give them tolls? Both gentlemen said that they were willing to take the tolls if they were given to them, but they could get on without them and did not care anything about them.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman yield for me to read what was said on that subject from the hearings?

Mr. ADAMSON. Certainly.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Dearborn, president of the American-Hawaiian Line, when before the committee, in discussing this question of tolls, and so forth, was asked this question:

Mr. HAMLIN. If I understand you on this question, the tolls, everything else being equal, you could carry trade through the canal at the rate you now get from Hawaii to New York and pay a dollar a net ton and make more money than you are now, making on account of the transshipment?

Mr. DEARBORN. Yes; if rates of freight were unchanged.

Mr. HAMLIN. And, consequently, so far as you are concerned, the question of tollage is a negligible quantity?

Mr. DEARBORN. Yes; so far as any toll that has been considered.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Is it not also true that he said it would not make any difference to him because the tolls would be added to the price to the consumer?

Mr. HAMLIN. That is also true.

Mr. ADAMSON. I am glad of any interruption, Mr. Chairman, where I can shed any light, but the distinguished gentleman from California is beyond my capacity to enlighten him. He is the chief malefactor in the line of digression and diversion from legitimate uses of the canal, and has been leading in this insurrection and interfering with the course of the committee in the opening of this canal throughout our entire sitting. He is the apostle of the other side and will have ample time himself. I will simply reply to his statement by saying that several gentlemen have asserted in magazine and newspaper articles and elsewhere that the tolls would simply be added to the consumer, but nobody yet has ever proved it.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. ADAMSON. And in his cross-examination he did not sustain it. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Does the gentleman recall that the testimony before the committee showed in substance that the amount of tolls at the rate of $1 per net registered ton, which is assumed as a basis at the beginning, would be practically from 40 to 60 cents per cargo ton, or between 2 and 3 cents per hundred pounds, and in view of that fact I would ask the gentleman how-much of a reduction of tolls would reach the consumer with a reduction of 2 to 3 cents per hundred pounds?

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman from Georgia answers that question I desire to amplify it by saying that at the outset we deny that it amounts to only 30 or 40 cents a ton. Tolls are based on net registered tonnage, upon total capacity of the ship, and if a ship goes through with half its space occupied that means that the cargo in that ship is charged a double rate, so that it would not be 40 cents a ton; and I have the figures to show that a majority of the ships do not go through loaded, which means that that in proportion is added to each ton.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, answering the two gentlemen, I will state that the gentleman from Minnesota is, in my judgment correct. I have not much of a head for mathematics, and if I had I would not want to put the whole arithmetic in the RECORD.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Let me answer the other gentleman first, please. I do know that this gentleman and others disclosed the fact that the amount of tolls was absolutely immaterial to the freight rates and immaterial to the consumer, for this reason: They either get to cutting the rates and get them down so low it makes no difference what the tolls are, or they make a combination and hold the rates up at a certain price, so that it makes no difference what the tolls are. Those two propositions are established incontrovertibly in the hearings. I now yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that it was disclosed in the hearings that instead of a ship going through half loaded, as the gentleman from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] says, under the practice of the Suez measurement they carry all the additional tonnage they possibly can on uncovered deck, which is not computed in the measurement at all?

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not dispute any of these statements that my interlocutors make. I recognize and remember some of them, but this is a voluminous record, and I can not recollect and swear to it all. I have put the record on the desk of every gentleman here, and I do not want to speak all day if I can help it.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to cut into the toll proposition now, but I simply wish to suggest that the gentleman from Georgia in eulogizing the gentleman from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] surely did not intend to slight the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY].

Mr. ADAMSON. Oh, he is not on the committee, and I do not want to talk about outsiders.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I desire him to be duly credited with just as much pernicious activity on this subject as the gentleman from California.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman from Washington is not a member of the committee, and I did not want to take liberties with him as I did with the others. He is a highly enthusiastic gentleman, however, and he has been so impregnated and infused and hypnotized with this heresy of ship subsidy in any possible form that he honestly believes that if you are not going to give his neighbors up there a ship subsidy on their ships you ought to fill up the canal at once.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman tell us whether the trade that was reported to have been made between the Pacific coast Members and certain southern Members concerning the election of Senators by direct vote extended also to the toll proposition?

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I shall have to ask the gentleman to name his committee of investigation to find that out. I do not know the origin of the report. I suppose the gentleman, as the last man to mention it to me, can tell me where he got it, and I might trace it back. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Oh, it was published in the newspapers and widely circulated on the floor of the House.

Mr. ADAMSON. I did not see it in the newspapers. I never talk about the newspaper men, because there are not only more of them in number, but they are bigger in size than I or my friends. They could talk about me or the gentleman from Illinois. Whenever they say anything in the newspaper that is not strictly accurate, I spread the mantle of charity over the poetic license that exists, because it is absolutely necessary to fill those large papers up with something, and if not enough truth happens to fill their papers those enterprising men have a right to fill up those columns by creating something. [Laughter.] The smartest men in the world, except drummers, are the newspaper men. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAMLIN. Do you except Congress?

Mr. ADAMSON. No. Now, Mr. Chairman, if I am not to be relieved by a further rest through questions of my colleagues, I will proceed. I referred to combinations, and I exonerated the coastwise trade from combinations. I have been told, however, about my friend Dearborn managing to cut rates enough on the American-Hawaiian Line to get a living amount of business away from the railroads without getting the rates low enough to do the people any good. Of course this is allegorical and metaphorical, but it has been supposed either he or an agent, for whatsoever a man doeth by another he doeth himself, had his ear close to the keyhole whenever the railroad authorities had a rate meeting in Chicago; and whenever a railroad rate was published the steamship rate, a few cents cheaper, appeared the next morning on a few leaders. That is not a violation of the anti-trust law. There is no trouble about that, but if shipowners can have this keyhole communication it demonstrates the greater facility with which they can find information enough with which to exercise their innate courtesy and not get in one another's way about the business. Now, there is great fear, and one of the hobgoblins in the question of a ship famine. There is conjured up a fear that there will be no ships to do the business, and there are some folks scared about there not being enough ships; and even as sane a man as my friend from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] began studying about the policy of giving entry to the coastwise trade in order to allow all tramps to be taken into the use of the coastwise trade.

Mr. SIMS. As a matter of justice.

Mr. ADAMSON. The alarm of the gentleman is not well grounded at all. He ought to have studied the report of the Commissioner of Navigation and looked at the list of American coastwise ships. It is true the Commissioner of Navigation is not to be absolutely trusted when he makes a digression and goes off on a long ship-subsidy argument that he is not capable of sustaining when cross-examined before the committee, but when he gives a list of coastwise ships in the United States you can rely on that.

And I have figured out his own list, and according to his own figures there are several thousand ships and nearly 2,000 steamers. There are 150 of them according to the letter I put into the hearings from him that can go through the canal profitably, because they are above 3,000 or 4,000 tons. I ask any gentleman here who is good at figures just to count up and see if 33 per cent of them should use the canal, and say they have an average tonnage of 4,000 each, it would be two and a half million tons a year, and it would constitute, I tell you, regardless of the speculations of the optimist and regardless of the guesswork of doctrinaires, it would constitute the bulk of our business the first few years through the canal and pay the Treasury $2,500,000. Now, the proposition is that there will not be ships enough to do the business. Have you been to New York Harbor and to Boston and to Philadelphia and Baltimore and Savannah and Brunswick and Charleston and on the Great Lakes? Have you noticed that more business is done through the canal at the Soo than at Suez or will be done at Panama possibly for many years? Have you noticed the amount of coastwise business on the Atlantic coast, on the Gulf coast, on the Great Lakes, and even on the Pacific coast in the Pacific cities? It will not lead you beyond the verge of veracity if you assert that the coastwise trade on the Pacific itself, the cities, may be as great as the trade through the Panama Canal will be, and so far as the coastwise trade is concerned going through the canal it will never be 10 per cent of the coastwise trade on the Gulf, the Atlantic coast, and the Great Lakes. Now, just look into these records, look into your business and steady common sense instead of going off on fads. There have been several widespread errors and some of them entered into honestly——

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ADAMSON. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNER. As I understand, the gentleman agrees that in fact the remitting or omitting of tolls on the Panama Canal would be in the end a subsidy? Is that true?

Mr. ADAMSON. It would be a great deal worse in my judgment. It is taking money already due the Treasury and giving it to a particular class of ships.

Mr. TOWNER. I understood that was the gentleman's provision. Then would the gentleman be in favor of opposing tolls on the Soo Canal, where the commerce is so tremendous, as he has just stated?

Mr. ADAMSON. I am coming to the gentleman's proposition just as hard as I can, and I tell him here that no tolls are charged on the Soo Canal.

Mr. TOWNER. It occurs to me, if the gentleman will pardon the statement, that that must be an exceedingly greater subsidy, if it is to be considered as a subsidy.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. If the gentleman will permit, does the gentleman consider that the Soo Canal is on a parity with the Panama Canal in any particular?

Mr. TOWNER. I am speaking merely about the principle.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is based on an entirely different principle.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. On an entirely different principle than the Panama Canal.

Mr. TOWNER. It occurs to me if the one is a subsidy the other should be considered so.

Mr. ADAMSON. My distinguished friend from Iowa, who is a fine lawyer and a good and genial gentleman, is in one of the categories I have mentioned. I have mentioned that some good and wise men have fallen into errors inadvertently. Prominent among those errors is the idea that the Panama Canal should be free because the American policy has been to make all American waterways free. In the first place, that is done by statute. Our statute makes all American waterways free. In the second place, those in which other countries are interested are made free by treaty. When it was not known where the origin of the Mississippi River was, but it was supposed it was in Canada, by treaty we made the navigation of the Mississippi River open to England as well as ourselves. When we built one canal on the Canadian border the Canadians built two. By treaty we agreed they should use ours and we would use theirs, and their border rivers would be navigable freely, and that our interests in the Great Lakes should be open freely also. So the border locks and the border canals are made free by treaty.

It is true with the Panama Canal that by treaty, whatever our practice, it must be uniform. The Panama Canal is built under two treaties. It must be operated by the terms of the treaties. We had to agree with England, which owns Canada, reaching from coast to coast, and owns possessions in the Caribbean Sea and the West Indies, and which claims she has as large interests in the Western Continent as we have, to be relieved from the Clayton-Bulwer treaty in order to build this canal. And we had to treat with Panama as to its construction, and we must build it and operate it in accordance with the terms of those treaties.

Now, as to the gentlemen who have propagated this erroneous statement and had it largely signed by unthinking bodies of men and commercial bodies and societies everywhere, who took the statement of leading men who were supposed to know and passed resolutions on them and sent them in here, if their doctrine be true, it proves entirely too much. I admit we are at liberty to make the Panama Canal free to all the world. If we propose to be that altruistic, and if we are able and willing to give all the vessels of the citizens of all continents free transportation, there would be no violation of any treaty in it. These gentlemen, if they pursue the logic of their contentions, are compelled to go to that extent. Then there will be no use for any toll keeper, no tollgates, and no tolls to be fixed on the Panama Canal. Let it all go free to the world. And that is what they prove, or they do not prove anything, in regard to their contention.

Let me go back to one thing, which I forgot on account of the interruption of my friend from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], and that is the application of the tolls to a part of the coastwise trade of the United States. If it is true that we ought to give them a subsidy, if it is true that we ought to give them an amount of tolls, do you want to discriminate among them? Are they dishonest enough among themselves to have some of them get a benefit which some of them do not?

If those who do business all the time on the Atlantic coast, and the Gulf, and the rivers, and the Great Lakes get no subsidy, why should those who go through the Panama Canal on a longer cruise, on a longer haul, with greater freight and greater profits, be given a subsidy of three or four thousand dollars a ton?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Is it not true that the ships which go through the Soo Canal receive a subsidy, if your definition is a subsidy? Has not the Government built those locks, and does it not own and operate them? If it is a subsidy for them to go through the Panama Canal which the Government builds, why is it not a subsidy for them to go through a canal on the other border which the Government has built?

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that my friend did not listen to me. I tried to state that there was nothing in the treaty to prevent our remission of the tolls to all the ships of the world if we want to do it. That is a question for Congress to settle. The statement is made that the "Soo" is made free by the terms of the treaties themselves, and that we have a reciprocal benefit of using the Welland Canal, built by Canada, in return for their use of ours, just as the navigation of Lake Michigan is made free to navigation by treaty.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield further?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I hope also that the gentleman will put the treaties to which he refers into the RECORD. I have not been able to find them.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I will say to the gentleman that I will put them in the RECORD before we get through. The gentleman need not worry.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Now, if the gentleman thinks that the giving of free tolls to our coastwise vessels passing through the Panama Canal is a subsidy, I will ask him whether the other 90 per cent that pass through the Soo Canal free of tolls are not receiving a subsidy for nothing. What is the difference between the Government building a harbor and allowing people to use it for nothing and building a canal and letting the ships use it for nothing?

Mr. ADAMSON. The 10 per cent that goes through the canal also uses the same harbors, if they wish to use them. They are all open and all are treated alike. I have explained to the committee that all our domestic waters and harbors are open, first, because we made them so by statute, and, second, because we made some thirty-odd treaties with the different nations of the world, making ourselves free to their harbors and making them free to ours.

I also tried to make it plain—and the treaties will be put into the RECORD by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS]—that waters on the border and the rivers on the border, and harbors, some in our country and some in Canada, are made free by the two Governments. Before we found where the Mississippi River originated, thinking it might be in Canada, we made the navigation of that river free to English subjects. Great Britain would not have been interested in the matter if it had not been thought that she had the headwaters of that river in her own borders.

Now, 90 per cent of our coastwise trade will continue to enjoy the same privileges as the 10 per cent that will go through the Panama Canal. They work all the time for the benefit of the American people, building up and transmitting our commerce from port to port. Here is the one-tenth of those ships—10 per cent—that by agreement, as I have shown, goes through the canal, the one standing off for another; and the others do not compete with them; and here it is proposed to take $4,000 apiece, on the average, for every passage, out of the Treasury of the United States and give it to that 10 per cent.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. ADAMSON. In a moment. I say, I do not care whether you call it a subsidy or a gratuity or a largess or a gift; but if you are going to give anything to the coastwise ships of the United States, give it to them all alike. Give them an equal and fair chance. But I protest that if you do it at all, you should do it by a separate bill and a separate process. Do not take out of the Treasury the $4,000 per ship which the Treasury is entitled to, and give it to this 10 per cent.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Now, if the gentleman wants to do that and leave it to a future Congress to determine whether or not in the use of the Panama Canal we shall discriminate in favor of American ships, why does he use this language in section 5?—

No preference shall be given nor discrimination shown directly or indirectly to the vessels of any nation, its citizens or subjects, other than vessels belonging to the Government of the United States (including those belonging to the Panama Railroad Co.), and the Government of the Republic of Panama, observing the rules and regulations of the Panama Canal.

Now, that, to my mind, is an interpretation of our treaties with foreign countries, and the committee, in section 5, are undertaking to declare that policy. Are you not willing that that language shall go out of the bill, and leave it to a future Congress to determine the policy of this Government with reference to the canal, and interpret the treaties, and not have you interpret them for us in this language?

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, it would rather break the thread of my argument to go into that now. I am trying to get through with the economic discussion of this subject of the remission of tolls before I go to the treaty. When I reach the discussion of the treaty I will undertake to explain the situation to the satisfaction of the committee, if not to the satisfaction of the gentleman from Missouri.

I want to stick to the text I am on, if I can. Before leaving the proposition I want to emphasize the fact that if 33⅓ per cent of the coastwise ships go through that canal, giving the American coast of the Pacific Ocean a ship a day arriving and leaving, in all human probability it will accommodate their necessities for a long time to come. Any of you who are familiar with the sailing list of the ship companies and the business they do will find that they sail once a week, twice a week, or once every two weeks, and when it comes to sending a 4,000-ton ship there every day and another one back the same day, every day in the year, no man need have any doubt that for years to come that will accommodate all the coastwise trade of that coast.

But while the committee were satisfied that whether we desired it or not we are bound by the treaty, we based our action primarily on the fact that we were digging this canal at an immense expense, that we want to see it started successfully, that there is not business enough in sight to insure profits on it at the beginning; but we have a right to open it for all there is in it and run it for all it will bring for a few years and see what it will do, and we think that private and selfish special interests ought to postpone their claims and allow this great enterprise to go into operation and demonstrate its capacity before taking up any other question.

Now as to the treaty itself. While we based our action on economic questions and common sense, yet we are compelled in decency and honor to recognize the obligations of the United States.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Certainly.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I understood from the gentleman's remarks a few moments ago that there was a combination among the shipping interests, a working agreement, under the terms of which only certain ships in the coastwise trade were to go through this canal, that the others would not. Is that true?

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, they all bitterly deny any combination, but they all admit the soft impeachment that they are very courteous any very prudent financially, and that when they see a track sufficiently occupied by a ship line they are so prudent that they will not put another line on that track, and one of them answered my question by saying he did not believe he would find it profitable to compete with the American-Hawaiian Line by going through the canal.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Exactly.

Mr. ADAMSON. His opinion being that the American-Hawaiian Line itself would be able to transact the coastwise business of that canal.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. And that being true, was it the opinion of the committee that a free canal would give the American shipper lower freight rates, or, on the contrary, that the shipping companies themselves would pocket the $4,000 per ship?

Mr. ADAMSON. It appeared to us that not one cent of profit would ever go to the consumer if it did to the shipper, and it was not demonstrated to us that it would ever go to the shipper, even. But conceding that it was possible for them to find the shippers and give them their part of that toll, the shippers would be a very small part of the American people, and they would never be able to refund it to the consumer. So the argument fails at every step.

Mr. SIMS. Inasmuch as the coastwise lines do not now compete from port to port on the Atlantic coast, why should they change their whole policy and compete from port to port between the Pacific coast and the Atlantic coast?

Mr. ADAMSON. They have practically said they would not, that it would not be profitable.

Mr. SIMS. Certainly not.

Mr. ADAMSON. That it would not be good sense for them to do it.

Mr. KNOWLAND. According to the gentleman's logic I take it that he does not hold that a tariff tax would be a burden, or at least that if the tax was removed, the consumer would not get the benefit of its removal.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is a pretty long story on which there are some different opinions, and I do not have any idea that the gentleman from California and I could ever agree on it, either as a matter of fact, or conclusion, or principle.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield for an interruption?

Mr. ADAMSON. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNER. I dislike to interrupt the gentleman.

Mr. ADAMSON. I love to have the gentleman interrupt me.

Mr. TOWNER. I should like to have an explanation of a problem that has bothered me somewhat. I understood the gentleman to say that the difference in principle between the Welland Canal and the Panama Canal was that we have a treaty stipulation with Great Britain by which, in consideration for the use of the Welland Canal, we yielded the free use of the Soo Canal.

Mr. ADAMSON. They are all governed by treaty.

Mr. TOWNER. I understand so.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman's statement is incorrect. I do not think the chairman of the committee understood it that way. That is not the arrangement.

Mr. ADAMSON. What I mean to say is that the use of each canal is governed by treaty.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. That is correct.

Mr. TOWNER. Is it not true that the United States would have absolute power under our treaty with Great Britain to impose tolls on American ships?

Mr. ADAMSON. Is the gentleman talking about the Panama Canal?

Mr. TOWNER. In the Soo Canal.

Mr. ADAMSON. They would not violate a treaty against the interests of their own citizens if they would not against the citizens of another country.

Mr. TOWNER. The question of a subsidy is involved.

Mr. ADAMSON. You can call it what you please.

Mr. TOWNER. I think the gentleman does not understand me; I do not wish to interrupt him unnecessarily.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is all right.

Mr. TOWNER. This is the thought in my mind: If it is wrong now to remit tolls on the Panama Canal to American ships, then it is wrong to remit tolls on the Soo Canal to American ships.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not think so.

Mr. TOWNER. Why not?

Mr. ADAMSON. It is right to conduct the Soo Canal according to the treaty and to conduct the Panama Canal according to the treaty.

Mr. TOWNER. There is nothing to prevent the exemption in either case.

Mr. ADAMSON. Oh, the gentleman is badly mistaken. I will put both treaties into the RECORD and he can see for himself.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman one more question.

Mr. ADAMSON. Very well.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Before the gentleman leaves the question of tolls I would like to ask him this question: I understood him to say that he did not think a free canal would benefit the consumer, and he doubted whether it would benefit the shipowner.

Mr. ADAMSON. I said giving the tolls to the owner of a ship would not benefit a single consumer one nickel.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. And the gentleman doubted whether it would benefit the shipper. Suppose you add 50 cents a ton to the product going through the Panama Canal, would not that enable all the transcontinental railways to add 50 cents a ton to every ton they carried on land of similar traffic, so that when you give a dollar by toll to the Government you enable the railroads to charge $10 for themselves?

Mr. ADAMSON. Those are questions of practice and detail, and no amount of talk or theory can adjust them. My proposition is that the canal tolls are going to be so low that they will not be affected by anything that we could normally get from the railroads, anyway, and that they will not be affected by anything the ships themselves do, for the ships would either by combination make the tolls immaterial to the shipper and consumer or they would by cutting rates make them immaterial to the consumer.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. If the gentleman will pardon me, I want to add this one suggestion. These gentlemen assume that the present condition of blanket rates between the East and the West will continue, and if so, if the canal rates were reduced, the blanket rates would be proportionately reduced. The Interstate Commerce Commission, in all of its cases since the passage of the amendment of our friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] relating to the long and short haul clause, has held that the blanket rates shall no longer be in effect and in its report has indicated its policy to abolish them, and if they are no longer put into effect and no longer allowed, the railroads can not reduce their through rates to the canal rates, because the intermediate rate and territory would not permit it. The whole system of rate making will be different between the Atlantic and the Pacific by the time the canal rates are in operation.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If that is true, the ships will carry the products through the canal.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The result will be to throw an immense mass of traffic through the canal and take it away from the railroads, and that can not be helped.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Why should it not be done?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. It should be done, and we are glad to have it done; but it does not help them at all to reduce the tolls.

Mr. BOWMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. BOWMAN. Suppose the rates are based on the cost of carriage, how much would they be reduced by any rates that might be made on merchandise and products that pass through the canal?

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. BOWMAN. Suppose the rates upon the railroads are now fixed upon the cost of carriage, upon a reasonable return on the money invested, what effect would it have upon any rate which might be established across the canal? In other words, if the rates to-day are fixed upon the cost of carrying, any rate which you might apply across the canal could not lower those rates.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, it might not lower the rates on the railroads, but the rates will be so low via the canal, according to the evidence before our committee, that a great deal of the business will go through the canal; and if it does that, the people will get the benefit of the cheaper rates, while the Treasury will get the benefit of the tolls.

I have now tried to demonstrate in line with the report of the committee that we ought not give any of these tolls to the small per cent of the shipowners or prospective shipowners in the United States engaged in coastwise trade, even if we could.

I come now to the other proposition, that in honor and decency we can not do it, if we wanted to, under the treaties which we have made. I know that gentlemen get enthusiastic and talk wild sometimes, and they have been filling up the newspapers and the magazines for years on this subject in anticipation of the opening of the canal, and one sometimes see the wild statement that it is a fight between the ships and the railroads. That is as silly as it is unfounded. The railroads and the shipowners frequently get friendly when it is financially to their interest to be friendly, and when it is financially to their interest not to be friendly they are not friendly. Money is kin all over the world and every last dollar is denationalized. There is not a dollar of it in circulation on the face of the earth that cares a continental for any flag on the face of the earth except in so far as the prospect is that that operation under that flag will double the dollar. The proof of that is in every ship line in the world, and in the stockholders and in the bondholders in them all over the face of the waters to-day.

There is another wild and foolish opinion expressed by those in respect to others who deny this right, that they are turning from American ships in favor of the ships of England.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I notice there is a provision in this bill calculated to prohibit ships owned——

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman please wait until I reach that?

Mr. MADDEN. I just wanted to ask the purpose of putting that in the bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. When I get to it I will tell the gentleman, but I hate to have my most beautiful sentences punctured and dislocated by questions, shot right into the middle, that ought more properly to apply to some other subject of the bill.

Mr. MADDEN. I thought the gentleman was on that point now.

Mr. ADAMSON. No; I am proceeding to show it would not be polite in us, after making a solemn treaty not to do so, to show discrimination in favor of some ships as against others. As I said, Mr. Chairman, some people excitedly say that those who are in favor of observing this treaty are favoring England. Well, I was sort of a jingo when we started in to try and dig this canal and wanted to drive England away, but I found we had to notice treaties, not only through the respect and veneration we should have for international law but because it might not be prudent to be getting up unnecessary jars with foreign powers, unless it was somebody that we could whip easily.

It is unfortunately true, or fortunately, if you can so state it, that England came here and was our mother. We might not have been here if she had not come here first. She did not get off the nest and leave as soon as we wanted her to. The bees got ready to swarm and we told the original hive to leave and let the young swarm stay here and grow up with the country. I reckon we made a mistake when Cornwallis surrendered that we did not have there our friend from California, Mr. KNOWLAND, and our friend from Washington, Mr. HUMPHREY, and Brother ALEXANDER, so that they might put a codicil to that surrender and fix up the treaty of amity and commerce that we later made with England, whereby she would get out of these regions and let us have Canada and all her possessions in the West Indies. I do not see what business she has there, unless it is to help her make money, and I do not know that I like to have her putting the lines over us any more than anybody else. I think we ought to be able to run things on our own continent, if we can, but somehow or other when we got Cornwallis to surrender and got a treaty of independence we felt pretty friendly over it. We then proceeded to make a treaty with the old lady about how we would behave, and with some 30 other nations. Then, after the war of 1812, not being properly advised by the gentlemen who know of late days how to construe treaties in favor of our own ships, we made another mistake and let her off again without taking Canada and all these things away from her.

It is a physical and historical fact that I deplore. I assure my friends on the Pacific coast I am no tory. I believe I would fight England, I would as soon invade her, if I were a fighting machine, as any other country, if I thought that I could whip her. But, gentlemen, you have to look these facts in the face. But that was our position in 1812, and then along later than that Mr. Clay got to help run the Government and other great men, and they kept on making treaties and kept on talking about canals, and they finally made the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. It authorized a canal for commercial purposes. It was not a Government canal for governmental purposes, and we were prohibited from doing hardly anything at all except to help furnish the money and help England guarantee the neutralization of the canal, and I will show you some utterances by which to show you how these things were dealt with and how these things were put in the treaty. That was for an Isthmian Canal. The whole of the first section pledges that neither country will acquire any influence at all or use any advantage that either may possess—

> With any State or Government through whose territory the said canal may pass, for the purpose of acquiring or holding, directly or indirectly, for the citizens of the one any rights or advantages in regard to commerce or navigation through the said canal which shall not be offered on the same terms to the citizens or subjects of the other.

The fifth section contains most specific language:

> If both Governments or either Government should deem that the persons or company undertaking or managing the same adopt or establish such regulations concerning the traffic thereupon as are contrary to the spirit and intention of this convention, either by making unfair discriminations in favor of the commerce of one of the contracting parties over the commerce of the other.

Now, section 6:

> That of constructing and maintaining the said canal as a ship communication between the two oceans, for the benefit of mankind, on equal terms to all.

Some of them say, What are you reading them for? That section has been superseded. Let us see whether it is or not. The preamble of the treaty which we made superseding this treaty is as follows:

> By whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th of April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention.

Now, what is article 8 of that convention? I read three or four of the other sentences to show the idea presented in that treaty.

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain having not only desired, in entering into this convention, to accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a general principle, they thereby agree to extend their protection, by treaty stipulations, to any other practicable communications, whether by canal or railway, across the isthmus which connects North and South America, and especially to the interoceanic communications, should the same prove to be practicable, whether by canal or railway, which are now proposed to be established by way of Tehuantepec or Panama. In granting, however, their joint protection to any such canals or railways as are by this article specified, it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford.

But, gentlemen say, the Hay-Pauncefote treaty supersedes that treaty and provides that the Government of the United States may construct and manage a canal as the owner thereof. I call attention to the fact that that other section, where it is authorized to operate and maintain a canal as the sole owner and constructor thereof, and so forth, also contains the qualification, "subject to the terms of this treaty," and the terms of this treaty are that article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty shall be unimpaired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will permit me, it might be inferred from the gentleman's reference to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty that the United States was to construct a canal. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty did not necessarily contemplate the construction of a canal by the United States, but by any other party or nation.

Mr. ADAMSON. Not by any nation, but by private capital.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The terms of the treaty would apply to anyone undertaking the construction of a canal.

Mr. ADAMSON. Of course, the United States and England guaranteeing the neutrality and equality. Now, Mr. Chairman, there is one other error that gentleman have fallen into, and that is, they make a discrimination as to coastwise and foreign shipping.

I will call attention to the fact, but I will not take the time to read the treaties, as the gentleman from Minnesota has collated all of them, and has an unanswerable demonstration on the subject, and as I have spoken on the subject, I am going to ask him to put those in his speech.

Mr. HAMLIN. I want to call your attention and the committee's attention to another fact, that when we entered into a treaty with Panama we especially, in article 18 of that treaty with Panama, recognized section 1 of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, to which you referred, in this language:

The canal, when constructed, thereto shall be neutral in perpetuity, and shall be opened upon the terms provided for by section 1 of article 3 of, and in conformity with, all the stipulations of the treaty entered into by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain on November 18, 1901.

Mr. ADAMSON. The same obligation exists from us to Panama as existed from us to Great Britain.

Mr. ALEXANDER. If the gentleman will permit, I wanted to call attention to the fact that while you may regard that as correct, in section 5 of this you provide the Government of Panama shall use the canal free of toll.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will come to that.

Mr. HOBSON. I want to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will you let me answer the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] on that question, and hold your question a minute? In answer to the statement of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER], the right of a constructor and owner and manager, who would put tolls into one pocket and take them out of the other with his own hand, certainly would allow the constructor, owner, and manager, standing the expense and taking the returns, to pass his own individual ships free. And therefore the ships of the United States Government are passed through free. By these treaties, and pursuant thereto, the United States had a right to make a contract with any Central American power and to insure a canal right through the country. In order to do so they had to make a contract. Inasmuch as the United States was compelled to contract for the place to dig that canal, I think it could operate as constructor and owner and pay the expense and take the profit; it had to make terms, and it had to make terms it could comply with, and it should comply with them when it made them. It duly made a contract with Panama, and it created, in order to do it, a Republic for its own purposes; and the first article of the treaty is that, "We will uphold and maintain the sovereignty of this Republic forever." We put in the treaty that guaranty to begin with, and then they make a contract to the effect, "I will use your land and you give me the perpetual right to use it, and give you so much money, and after nine years so much money annually, and I will allow your Government ships the free use of the canal, because you are substantially in partnership with me; you are, at least, a quasi owner; you are the owner of the land on which I have got to dig the canal, and I have got to treat with you in order to dig it, and I have got the right to give you the free use of the canal for your Government ships."

Mr. SIMS. Is it not the right of the Panama Government to retain instead of the United States Government to bequeath?

Mr. ALEXANDER. You are urging those as reasons why we violate the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty?

Mr. ADAMSON. No, sir. I think, Mr. Chairman, there is no violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The United States as constructor gives her the right for the valuable consideration of the land on which to construct the canal, to use the canal freely for all official vessels—and only the constructor in the language of the treaty.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. If you will allow me, I think I can explain. The treaty with Great Britain provides in article 3 for two essential things: First, equality; and, second, neutralization. In article 4 it provides for a change of the territorial sovereignty of the Panama Zone. The treaty provides, in substance, that the United States is responsible: First, for equality; second, for neutrality; and third, that the zone itself shall not be interfered with so far as neutrality is concerned. The burden is on the United States for doing those things. It is expressly provided it shall be on the United States by providing in article 2 that it shall have the exclusive right for providing for the regulation and management. Now, that has been construed more carefully and elaborately by Secretary Hay, who framed the treaty, and by Senator Davis, of Minnesota, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, who reported the treaty, and by Lord Lansdowne, the British foreign minister, who framed the treaty on the part of Great Britain. And that treaty was this: The burden was on the United States for strengthening the canal and for that right we had the right to fortify. The burden is on us to say that the canal shall be kept sanitary, and that the burden of obligation shall be taken from us in part and be put upon the Government of Panama, as we had a right to do before the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

In addition we made an agreement with Panama that Panama should establish ports of refuge at her own expense and keep them open at all times, as we had the right to do under the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Then we exacted from Panama that she should enforce the provisions of article 4 to maintain her own sovereignty, and she can maintain her own sovereignty and peace along the canal, and sanitation along the canal, and pass her own ships through; and by that provision, pursuant to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, we made that agreement with Panama that she should take those matters up and take them off our hands and save us from the incurrence of that expense. So that the gentleman from Missouri will easily see that the provisions of the Panama treaty are for directly carrying out the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Mr. ALEXANDER. In other words, they are giving us value received in exchange for free tolls?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Not at all. We are responsible for the conditions in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. In carrying out that responsibility we are compelling Panama to bear part of the expense and we bear the other part of the expense. In other words, we are enforcing provisions 2, 3, and 4 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Mr. ALEXANDER. In exchange, as I say, for that we are giving them free tolls?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Only to that extent, and not in that sense.

Mr. ALEXANDER. But if we build the canal, is not that a sufficient consideration for us to give our vessels free tolls?

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. ADAMSON. I do.

Mr. HOBSON. Will the gentleman tell me whether, in his judgment, irrespective of the matter of subsidy or equal tolls charged to the vessels of all nations, the payment of the tolls of American ships passing through by the American Government would be in violation of the spirit of the treaty?

Mr. ADAMSON. I was coming to that proposition, Mr. Chairman, as soon as I had finished the statement I was engaged in making. I was calling the attention of the committee to the mistake which gentlemen make in differentiating under the treaty between coastwise trade and foreign ships. The rule will be found by reference to the treaties which the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] will call to the attention of the House, that whenever in these treaties of amity and commerce and navigation a distinction is to be made, it is done in express terms. It will be found in thirty and odd of our treaties that where it was desired to make a distinction it was expressly stated that "the coastwise trade is exempted from the operation of this treaty."

That exemption is not made in any of the four or five treaties that have been made touching the Isthmian Canal at any point or any railroad on the Isthmian Canal except in two papers—in the treaty with Granada and in the treaty with Panama. In the treaty with Nicaragua some language is used something like this, except some of it is made stronger: "Citizens of foreign countries shall not pay any higher tolls than are charged to our own citizens." Every one of these isthmian treaties with the Central American States uses the language I have suggested except one treaty with Mexico and one concession from Nicaragua, which use either the same or stronger language than the treaty with England. Some of them expressly say that, as between the citizens of those countries and foreign countries, the tolls shall be the same; no higher for the foreigners than for natives. The only exception to the thirty and odd treaties is the Mexican treaty in regard to the Tehuantepec route. It is based on a substantial reason. Mexico built the railroad between two of its own ports, on its own territory, and paid the expense itself, and so in its treaty of amity and commerce and navigation with us Mexico expressly stipulated that all foreign countries should be treated alike, but expressly stipulated that foreign nations should not be treated on the same basis as its own citizens.

There is one concession from Nicaragua which did the same thing that Mexico did, and that was that inasmuch as she was doing the work between two of her own ports she would let foreign nations all fare equally, but not equally with the subjects of Nicaragua.

Now, I am making this statement because it is argued in relation to that discrimination that while the treaty may bar us from giving these free tolls to ships in foreign trade, yet so far as the coastwise trade is concerned, it is admissible, because they are not in competition with the ships of foreign countries and are not to be considered therewith.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, I think perhaps the gentleman has simply omitted to call the attention of the committee to the fact that when the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty was sent to the Senate for ratification by Mr. McKinley in December, 1900, the Senate attempted to amend that treaty with this language:

ART. 3. The United States reserves the right, in the regulation and management of the canal, to discriminate in respect to the charges for traffic in favor of the vessels of its own citizens engaged in the coastwise trade.

That amendment was defeated by a vote of 27 to 43 in the Senate, by which the Senate recognized the binding force of the original treaty unless it was relieved by direct legislation.

Mr. ADAMSON. I think I put that in the majority report.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Will the gentleman allow me to make this observation right there——

Mr. ADAMSON. I prefer that the gentleman put it into his own speech. I know what he intends to say.

Mr. KNOWLAND. The amendment in favor of fortification of the canal was voted down by a larger majority than that, and yet we are fortifying the canal.

Mr. ADAMSON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I come to the last proposition on this subject. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] asked me a question and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] asked me a question. The gentleman from Missouri asked me why it was that certain language is in the bill. I am afraid the gentleman has not given that attention which he should have been giving for the last 15 years to the treaties which have been ratified or he would not have asked the question. The gentleman from Missouri asked me about the following language and asked me if I would not agree to strike it out:

No preference shall be given or discrimination shown, directly or indirectly, to the vessels of any nation, its citizens or subjects, etc.

This was complained of in the minority report. I wish to say, without giving away any secrets of the committee, that the section as originally drawn had a good deal more in it than that, and it was objectionable to a great many people on and off the committee; and as the committee was deciding the case on economic grounds, and not attempting to foreclose the consideration of a treaty for future generations, we tried to strike out everything that was objectionable, and thought we had; and in apologizing for this I think when I explain the sources from which it came some of the gentlemen will forgive me if it was an infelicity in the use of language.

As I have stated before, a great many bills have been introduced on this subject, and there has been a sort of evolution and growth, a little of this man's bill and that man's bill and the other man's bill creeping in. The language used was unconsciously taken from other bills, most of which had been introduced by statesmen in sympathy with the minority report, who could not have intended the language in the sense attributed to it by the minority report. For instance, in House bill 17589, introduced by that great persistent apostle of discriminating tolls, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY], on page 2, beginning on line 9, the language is used beginning:

No preference shall be given to the vessels of any nation, its citizens or subjects.

The same language is used by Senator JONES in Senate bill 2455, Sixty-second Congress, page 6, line 4. In House bill 31436, introduced in the Sixty-first Congress by an able and distinguished leader of this House, whose position on this subject I do not seek here to locate, incorporated provisions which made discrimination possible.

The House passed House bill 12316, a bill for certain purposes, and sent it over to the Senate, where it was referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, dominated by that prince of the advocates of discrimination, Senator Flint, who wrote the committee report, reporting the bill back into the Senate with sundry amendments, among which the same language was used complained of in the minority report on page 7, beginning on line 1. That language could not have been used with the meaning ascribed to it here by the minority report. In the amendments reported by Senator Flint, the advocates of discrimination went to the limit and provided expressly for free tolls for any vessel engaged in the coastwise trade. Happily for its credit, the Senate never acted on that bill.

Now, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] asked me a question, and he does not seem to be here to listen to my answer; but I will answer his question anyway.

Mr. HAMLIN. He fired and fell back.

Mr. ADAMSON. Our contention for the construction of the treaty, it seems to me, has been admitted by most advocates of discrimination who have introduced bills, the gentleman from California [Mr. KNOWLAND], the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY], the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], Senator LODGE, and Senator Frye, and others who have sought to provide that the tolls imposed upon American vessels should be refunded out of the Treasury. The same position has been taken by such of our Cabinet officers as have been betrayed into the advocacy of preferential treatment. The able and distinguished Commissioner of Navigation, who devoted so much of his last report to misinformation on the subject of ship subsidy, makes Senator Frye's bill the basis of his argument, and argues himself and all the balance of the minority out of court by proposing to admit that the treaty expressly prohibits discrimination at the canal, but providing that the Government refund to them their tolls out of other money.

The same position has been taken by certain Cabinet officers who have been betrayed into the advocacy of preferential treatment. Two or three gentlemen had sought to differentiate between American ships engaged in foreign trade and those engaged in the coastwise trade, for which differentiation there is no authority in law, precedents, or reason.

Now, as to whether this Government can provide preferential assistance to its ships, domestic or foreign, whether a foreign Government may provide assistance to their ships, domestic and foreign, are questions entirely foreign to our consideration here. We have demonstrated by treaty, and there is no getting around it, that an erroneous action by Congress might involve our country in a serious criticism and trouble with the powers of the world by not maintaining our honor. The bills I have cited, introduced by great men, and the quotations I have made by Cabinet officers and others recognize the proper construction of the treaty and propose that the Government provide other preferential assistance for their ships.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the best and the logical course, if they deserve and need help, is to rest on that proposition, recognize the inviolability of our treaty obligations, and use the powers of Congress otherwise to make any provision they wish or can get Congress to make to help their ships, foreign and domestic.

It is true that other Governments have made treaties to help their ships, but in every case the ships help the Government. Some have helped mail ships, but the mail ships hauled the mail. Some have helped passenger ships, but the passenger ships helped the Government. France once made an arrangement with sailing ships to haul freight, but there was a quid pro quo for the Government.

The only proposition I have ever heard from these suppliants for this gratuity from the Government is that "We will build the ships and you will give us our tolls, twice on every trip, and after 50 years of peace, if war comes on and you need our old rotten hulks you can have them, provided you give us a high price for them; and if we can not agree we will have arbitration that will fix a high price and we will get the money." What kind of a quid pro quo is there in that? If they are honest and want to do the right thing when they ask us to give them the tolls they should agree that they will haul the soldiers, that they will haul munitions of war, that they will carry passengers when we have passengers to carry, and that we will give them the credit for the tolls so that they can be partly or wholly paid for. That would look somewhat honest on its face.

Mr. HOBSON rose.

Mr. ADAMSON. I want to say to the gentleman from Alabama that I answered his question while he was out. I cited a long list of most distinguished advocates for the preferential and differential rates to give American ships their tolls, in which there were a number of Senators and Representatives of the highest character and ability, among whom were some of our brethren on the other side, Senator LODGE, Senator Frye, the Commissioner of Navigation, Cabinet officers, in which they proposed that we concede the inviolability of the treaty, but provide to pay or refund, as the gentleman stated. I say that is a different proposition. I say if Congress wants to provide for plenary aid to the American shipping——

Mr. HOBSON. If I understand the gentleman correctly, he would find no objection or obstruction in the treaty to prevent our Government paying the tolls of our ships, those tolls being levied equally with tolls levied upon other ships.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, if I ever fall from grace and vote to give away the public money to any private shipowners I do not think I would mention the canal. I would just provide that by certain means these ships should have so much help.

Mr. HOBSON. We all understand the gentleman's views on that question, but on the matter of the treaty, has he taken into consideration the fact that a similar practice is indulged in in connection with the Suez Canal?

Mr. ADAMSON. I answered that while the gentleman was out.

Mr. HOBSON. I was necessarily absent to answer a telephone call, but so much wisdom falls from the lips of the gentleman from Georgia that one needs to be here constantly to get it all.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not know much about the wisdom that falls from my lips, but it is to the credit of the gentleman from Alabama that he has so much to disseminate that he has to be in a good many places to shed it about. I do not censure him because he is popular.

Mr. HOBSON. I thank the gentleman; but do I understand that the gentleman recognizes any obstacle in the treaty obligations of our Government to paying the tolls of our vessels? I mean not only the treaty, but the spirit of the treaty.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I believe if we would introduce this bill in the language of some of those introduced that the tolls paid by American shipping shall be immediately paid back to the ships at the canal we would as grossly violate the treaty as if we remitted the tolls directly, because that would be a subterfuge that any Englishman would be smart enough to discover, and he would kick about it; but if Congress is able to devise any scheme by which it will help American shipping, by which it will contribute to their lines or operations and make no mention of the canal, and steer entirely clear of the treaty, the gentleman could reach his purpose.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I can not quite see yet an answer to my question. The gentleman is aware evidently that a practice exists not only on the part of the British Government——

Mr. ADAMSON. No; I am not.

Mr. HOBSON. Whereby tolls paid by their ships going through the Suez Canal and through canals under which there are treaty obligations are returned——

Mr. ADAMSON. I am not aware of it. Some wild statements have been made upon that subject, but they did not stand the glare of cross-examination. As I stated in the gentleman's absence, foreign Governments have made arrangements with ships, and some of them have paid enough to pay canal tolls. It is calculated, and the language of the Commissioner of Navigation is in some cases that it is estimated to be enough to cover that, but in only one or two occasions have they expressly said that they are paying enough for the canal tolls. And further, in answer to the gentleman's proposition, I call his attention to the fact that the people who built the Suez Canal are not a government. I called attention earlier in my statement to the fact that that canal is not in charge of any government, that it is simply built under a guaranty of neutralization, that several Governments took stock in a French corporation—or the citizens of various countries; and there can be no possible analogy between the situation and management of that canal and the management of the Panama Canal in a foreign country, built by the American Government under strict treaty stipulations with two powers that at the canal everybody shall be treated alike and equally. It is impossible under the treaty for the canal to be made an instrument of settling the differences and inequalities of the commercial affairs of other countries or matters in other parts of the world. The point is that under the treaties the United States is bound at the canal to operate that canal physically on exactly equal terms, without seeking to inquire into the domestic conditions in the various countries of the world, or to inquire who pays subsidies or who protects coastwise shipping or what inequality exists here or there or elsewhere.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I hate to impose on the gentleman's good nature, but I can conceive how the British Government, or some other Government, might proceed to pay out of its treasury the tolls levied by our Government upon their ships passing through the Panama Canal. I want to get the gentleman's idea, because he has investigated this matter so thoroughly. I want to get his interpretation as to whether our Government by an appropriation of Congress could appropriate for the specific purpose of paying the tolls of our ships through the Panama Canal, and whether that action of our Government would be in violation of the spirit of the treaty?

Mr. ADAMSON. I have answered the gentleman——

Mr. HOBSON. An answer yes or no would please me very much.

Mr. ADAMSON. I have answered distinctly time and again that if the gentleman made it evident in the act which he was passing that it was a subterfuge to avoid the terms of the treaty it would be discovered by an Englishman as quickly as it would by a Yankee. You can not fool either of them about commercial matters. But as a friend of the gentleman and as a lawyer willing to serve him, if he desires to have my services, I would say that if he wants to accomplish that purpose, if he can pass a bill through Congress to give any particular set of men that much money, if he will just draw the bill and say give them that much money without saying that it is to get around the treaty or avoid paying canal tolls, then neither England nor anybody else could say a word against it.

Mr. HOBSON. And if we did say that it was to pay our tolls——

Mr. ADAMSON. It would be a subterfuge, and I believe if we wanted to do that we could not do it. And I believe, Mr. Chairman, that on this floor right here in this House—and here is one of them weighing 200 pounds—there are gentlemen who would be just as proud to see a great American commerce whitening the ocean with its sails as any of these gentlemen who shed crocodile tears about the decadence of the American merchant marine.

Mr. HAMLIN. The gentleman agrees with me, does not he, if any kind of subsidy should be given these coastwise ships, primarily to reimburse them for tolls paid to pass through the canal, it would be a violation of the spirit of these treaties?

Mr. ADAMSON. I say it is a violation of the treaty; and to pay the money back to them after they pay it in is a subterfuge and an evasion.

Mr. HAMLIN. And if we pass an act remitting the amount actually paid it would be just as bad.

Mr. ADAMSON. Why, certainly.

Mr. HOBSON. Would the gentleman object, in connection with his remarks about aiding vessels in the merchant marine, to saying whether he would vote for the aid of the general merchant marine above the discriminating duties?

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman was not in the House when I began my remarks. I said to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER], before you came in, that I want to help build American shipping.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I did not hear that.

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes, sir; in the beginning of my speech that we wanted to help build——

Mr. HOBSON. I will remind the gentleman that the committee reported out favorably at the last Congress a bill, part of which provided for a discrimination of 5 per cent reduction on dutiable goods brought in American bottoms, and a discrimination of 2 per cent ad valorem placed upon goods brought free in American bottoms.

Mr. ADAMSON. My statement to the gentleman from Missouri improves it greatly. I said these ships which went away from here loaded with American exports and brought back foreign goods should have the foreign goods admitted at a lower rate of duty, because that would benefit the people as well as the shipping trust. [Applause.]

Mr. FOWLER. I would like to ask the gentleman one question before he closes.

Mr. CANNON. Before the gentleman concludes I want to ask——

Mr. ADAMSON. There is another section on which I have not touched.

Mr. CANNON. That is section 11.

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes, sir; that is the one I now want to talk about.

Mr. CANNON. I will be very glad if the gentleman will do so.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I will tell the committee frankly about the genesis and history of that section 11. The insistence of certain gentlemen for help to our coastwise ships for various reasons, some of which I do not care to state or guess at, included among others the complaint——

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for order.

Mr. ADAMSON. If I may be permitted to conclude I would like to do so. The committee has been good to me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia will proceed.

Mr. FOWLER. I would like to ask the gentleman what he regards as Panama vessels. Does that include any vessels except——

Mr. ADAMSON. The bill expressly states Government vessels if there are any.

Mr. FOWLER. Not vessels owned by any individuals living in Panama?

Mr. ADAMSON. No; the Government; and the Government is a part of us. Mr. Chairman, as to section 11, I was going on to say that the people who are clamoring and delaying and hampering the opening and management of this canal use as one of their arguments that the railroads are going to run other ships out of business and put their ships on the canal and drive everybody off, and then raise their rates so that the canal would not do us any good commercially. The President put something about that in one of the messages; it was put in bills by four or five gentlemen, and I confess, inadvertently, I supposed they knew what they were doing; and I put it in a bill of mine about railroad ships going through the canal. But we studied the treaty, and we decided that at the canal we had to do the square thing as to all ships which came there, without regard to who owned them or where they came from, providing other nations observed our rules.

That is all there is. Those are all the conditions. Perhaps citizens of our own country might complain if we violated the treaty against them, just as well as the citizens of another country. We decided we did not know just what was going to happen—what the railroads were going to do to us there—and, furthermore, we thought if railroads engaged in interstate commerce were doing that it was the business of Congress to regulate them and manage them and keep them out of mischief. While we could not go to the canal and make it an instrument of discrimination, we could amend the interstate-commerce law so that the railroads that we regulated should not compete with themselves by putting ships on that canal in mock competition with themselves and drive other ships off of the canal. We put in this bill a provision, and we have all studied it, and we thought it would improve it a little; and we have submitted a committee amendment to the House as a substitute for that section, when we get to it.

I was willing to leave it out of the Panama Canal bill, along with the contention for free toll for American ships, and go on and provide for the opening and operation of the canal, the management of the zone, and having two or three years yet in which to watch events, wait and see what ought to be done to regulate the ships and railroads, and do it in due time. But there was such insistence that something should be done that we did take it up in the only possible and legal way under the treaty, and that which we submit in the substitute which we will offer when we reach section 11 is the sense of the majority of the committee as the way to deal with that question. While we may or may not deal with it in the Panama bill, we have got to deal with it some time in interstate commerce and coastwise trade. The question is coming up, and we have got to face it. The people in the country and the people in the vast areas through the interior of the country are not going to consent that they forever, by taxation, will have to keep up water courses and rivers and harbors for railroads to put ships on there in competition with their own tracks, in competition with their own commerce. I know of some lines, without having to refer to the evidence in the record, where a long line of steamships, supplemented by short railroads in the interior, make the same rates as a long railroad between the same towns and same sections. This condition will have to be met some time. It is 10 times more material to the coastwise trade and interior than the use of the Panama Canal. The Panama Canal is going to be a small thing compared with the difficulties in the United States coastwise trade. If the committee saw proper to keep it in this way, we would like to adopt it. If it does not, the committee will in the future deal with it as a separate amendment to the act to regulate commerce.

Mr. MALBY. Will the gentleman give way for an inquiry?

Mr. ADAMSON. I will, but I would be glad to stop.

Mr. MALBY. I appreciate the gentleman's desire, because I know he must be very tired. Has the gentleman read section 11?

Mr. ADAMSON. Are you not reading the substitute?

Mr. MALBY. I am reading the bill as furnished by the Clerk.

Mr. ADAMSON. I sent the gentleman a substitute this morning.

Mr. MALBY. I have not seen the substitute bill, but my inquiry relates, however, to the effect of section 11. That applies to all railroads owning stock or an interest in a line of steamboats, irrespective of the fact whether they use the Panama Canal or not.

Mr. ADAMSON. I would not give a cent for the provision to affect the Panama Canal alone if I could not make it useful in all the coastwise trade. It would not be worth a bawbee. The canal business presents only 10 per cent of the trouble.

Mr. MALBY. My only suggestion was that it is a very important matter to be considered in a bill regulating the government and traffic on the Canal Zone.

Mr. ADAMSON. I thought so, and I have explained to you how it got in there.

Mr. MALBY. Mr. Chairman, of course I have not had time to read the substitute, but it does apply to all the railroad and shipping lines outside of the Panama Canal line. Would it not be well for the chairman of the committee to explain it before we get to the five-minute rule, where we would have only five minutes to discuss one of the most important subjects in the entire bill?

Mr. ADAMSON. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but I thought I had just explained it.

Mr. MALBY. I have listened to the gentleman, and to my mind it does not seem to be an explanation of such an important matter as this.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman intimate what it is?

Mr. MALBY. I would like to know on what theory the committee proceeds to deny to a railroad company, as a part of its general system, necessary for the running of the railroad itself, a right to own a shipping line which is an extension or a feeder upon which the railroad itself absolutely, in many cases, depends for its transportation of freight. Why should you deny to them any ownership over that line, any more than you would deny to the railroad a right to extend its rails across to the very market where the ship goes?

Mr. ADAMSON. I answer the gentleman by denying his premise absolutely. No railroad has any right to run a ship line to the exclusion of real competition through the watercourses that ought to be competitive with itself. It is not true that railroads have built up waterways. Naturally ships were the original means of transportation, and the railroads have, through manipulation of capital, managed of late years to drive ships off of the watercourses along their own lines and put their own ships on them. I have no objection to their running ships where, as the gentleman says, they are feeders, to gather up and distribute business. That is all right. But when they propose to get possession of that watercourse that runs parallel to the railroad and take the business and raise the rates by excluding other ships prevents that and kills competition, and that course of action will be prevented some time, if it is not done in this bill. [Applause.]

Now, we have amended that in the substitute by making the Interstate Commerce Commission the judge or arbiter as to when a ship is in competition and when it is not. The commission could tell whether the ship line was operating in violation of the section or not. If it is all right to run it, let it run; but there is no use in taxing the people hundreds of millions of dollars to open up water channels on the delusive assumption that we are going to get cheaper transportation, which the figures show ought to be one-fifth of the cost of the railroad transportation, and then allow the railroads to take charge of all the business that ought to be competitive with them and raise the water rates to their own level. [Applause.]

I thank the committee for its kind attention to me. I did not want to talk as long as I have talked, but my brethren were kind to me.

Mr. MALBY. Will the gentleman allow a suggestion?

Mr. ADAMSON. I want to hear the speeches of others, and let somebody else have a showing. I suggest that the gentleman from New York ask the next speaker the question he has in mind.

Mr. MALBY. I would rather ask the chairman of the committee, because he knows.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will take the floor some other time, and then I can answer the gentleman.

Mr. MALBY. Just one question. I am familiar somewhat with the railroads operating through the State of New York, and——

Mr. ADAMSON. I can not agree that the gentleman shall make a speech.

Mr. MALBY (continuing). And I would like to inquire what particular objection there is against the railroads running through New York and having a terminal at Buffalo also having a line of steamships operating on the Great Lakes? I can assure the gentleman that he is mistaken in his premises that there is no diminution in the price of freight transportation, because the rates between New York and Chicago are lower by water than they are by rail.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman will have a chance to speak later.

Mr. MALBY. Under the rules we have not very much opportunity.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will see that the gentleman gets time during the debate.

Now, I hope that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] will put in the RECORD those treaties that he referred to. I have promised that he would. Then, I would like to yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS] after he has finished. [Applause.]

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, do I understand that the gentleman from Georgia desires to use more time now?

Mr. ADAMSON. Does the gentleman from Minnesota ask me a question?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I desire to know if the gentleman from Georgia desires to use more time now.

Mr. ADAMSON. No. I yielded to the gentleman from Minnesota, and when the gentleman finishes, if I am not in the Hall, I want to yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS].

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. How much time has been used by the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Four hours and 17 minutes.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Then I yield one hour to the gentleman from California [Mr. KNOWLAND], if he desires. Mr. Chairman, I should think that it would be in order that some of the time could be now occupied on this side. I desire to yield to the same side represented by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS]. They can arrange it among themselves.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is endeavoring to ascertain what the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS] desires.

Mr. DOREMUS. I will say to the gentleman from Minnesota that under an arrangement that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] had with the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] I am, at his request, controlling the time for those on this side of the House who are opposed to the majority report.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Does the gentleman desire to use more time of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. DOREMUS. No; I think not.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Then I will take some of the time, and will yield one hour to the gentleman from California [Mr. KNOWLAND], if he so desires.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. Chairman, having presented to the House the minority report upon the pending bill, providing for the operation of the Panama Canal, signed by both Democartic and Republican members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, it may be well for me to explain, for the benefit of those who perhaps have not read either report, that we dissent from the views of the majority touching but one section of the bill—section 5—dealing with the important question of tolls. The bill contains 13 other sections, over which there is practically no disagreement among the members of the committee. At the proper time we shall propose certain amendments to this section.

While opposing section 5, I shall support the remaining sections of the bill, and particularly section 11, which can not be too strongly commended, because it seeks to protect the people of the United States against a railroad-controlled canal. With no intention of disclosing committee secrets, I may say that I feel somewhat responsible for this section, a claim which I think my colleagues on the committee will not dispute. This statement is made without disparagement to others who were active in this important contest to prevent transcontinental railroads from minimizing the competitive value of the Panama Canal.

Before entering upon a discussion of the toll question, I feel that it is incumbent on me, as the Pacific coast Representative of this committee, to frankly state to the House and country some of the reasons which prompted practically all the leading commercial bodies of the Pacific coast to insist that the pending bill contain a provision to protect shippers against the abuses growing out of the control by railroads of competing water lines.

The Mann bill as reported to this House in 1910 contained a provision, which I offered in the committee, somewhat similar to the present section 11, preventing railroad corporations from owning or controlling water lines. That section was stricken out on the floor of the House as the result, I think I am safe in declaring, of the opposition of certain railroad interests. In order to prevent, in part at least, the stifling of water competition, I offered the following amendment from the floor, which the House adopted by a vote of—ayes 106, noes 77:

> Whenever a carrier by railroad in competition with a water route or routes shall reduce the rates on the transportation of any kind of traffic it shall not be permitted to increase such rates unless, after hearing by the Interstate Commerce Commission, it shall be found that such proposed increase rests upon changed conditions other than the elimination of water competition.

This amendment, with but slight change in phraseology, remained in the bill and is now a part of the interstate-commerce act. Its effect has been generally beneficial, but it fails to go far enough to meet conditions that will exist with the opening of the Panama Canal. In a speech before this House on April 10, 1910, anticipating the problems shippers would be called upon to face unless legislation was enacted of the character now proposed in section 11 of the pending bill, I said:

> Four hundred million dollars will be the cost of the Panama Canal. Will there accrue to the Nation benefits commensurate with such vast expenditures? Not unless we, as representatives of the people, enact legislation that will curb the power of the railroads to destroy the water competition, which, by the expenditures of these millions, we are seeking to develop. * * *

With the near approach of the opening of the canal the necessity for restrictive legislation is even more imperative than it was two years ago. I have no patience with those who contend that we should postpone the consideration of the subject of railroad owned or controlled water lines until the canal has been in operation for a few years. Why should we delay action until the transcontinental railroads have, perhaps, acquired, at the cost of millions of dollars, steamships to engage in domestic commerce through the canal in fake competition with themselves? To obtain relief from Congress under such conditions, with the railroad steamships in full operation, would be far more difficult than to now definitely announce a policy by the enactment of the pending provision dealing with this subject. Fair and full notice would thus be given to the transcontinental railroads that they must not attempt this method of throttling competition. [Applause.]

The people of California have not appealed to Congress for protection against imaginary dangers. Their experience of 30 years with railroad-controlled water lines is responsible for the demand, voiced through the leading commercial organizations in every section of the State, that Congress, in the pending bill, provide against the possibility of the railroads impairing the value of the Panama Canal as a regulator of transcontinental freight rates. Let me briefly review the causes which have so influenced public sentiment on the Pacific coast.

Between 1877 and 1892 the Pacific Mail Steamship Line, which was carrying freight in alleged competition with the railroads between San Francisco and New York via the Isthmus of Panama, was paid a monthly subsidy by what was known as the transcontinental railway pool, ranging between $110,000 and $75,000, the amount of the subsidy for these 14 years reaching the enormous total of $14,555,000. These monthly payments were in part for space in the steamers of the Pacific Mail, which space was frequently not filled; but the object of the subsidy was attained, and California shippers were deprived of the benefits of water competition. After 1892 this direct method of controlling water traffic was discontinued. A congressional investigation in 1893 had exposed the methods of this railway pool. The report of that special House committee, after pointing out how the payment of a monthly subsidy by the transcontinental railroads covering a period of 15 years had stifled competition via the Isthmian route, concluded by directing attention to the necessity of providing against similar abuses in the future, and this warning, sounded nearly 20 years ago, was strikingly prophetic of present-day conditions and needs with the canal nearing completion. Let me quote the significant concluding paragraph of this congressional report:

> Your committee can not refrain from calling attention to what seems an obvious deduction from the facts shown—that it is to the interest of the United States that the American people should absolutely control some outlet across the Isthmus at some point which shall be used for the benefit of American trade in general as an open and continuous competitor, affording no opportunity for entangling subsidies from great competing lines or chance of falling into the grasp of any monopoly through stock manipulation.

In 1893 the business men of San Francisco organized the North American Navigation Co., inaugurating a line of steamers between San Francisco and Panama. Fortunately there had been a rupture between the Panama Railroad Co. and the Pacific Mail, which made it possible for the new steamship line to make arrangements for through shipments to New York from San Francisco across the Isthmus.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. What year was that?

Mr. KNOWLAND. Eighteen ninety-three.

For 15 months this line operated, but was compelled to discontinue as the result of a relentless war made upon it by the transcontinental railroads. The cost of the maintenance of this line to the merchants of San Francisco was $300,000, but it has been carefully estimated that the savings in reduced freights for that period amounted to $10,000,000 to the State of California. For the period during which this line was in operation the railroads reduced both east and west bound freight rates on an average about 50 per cent, but the rates were again raised when this opposition was eliminated. I will say in this connection, that under my amendment to the commerce act adopted in 1910 that could not be done at the present time, but there is no law to prevent a railroad-owned steamship line from lowering the rates and again raising them.

Mr. RAKER. In other words, the railroads reduced their rates and drove them off the ocean, and then raised them again as soon as they were driven off?

Mr. KNOWLAND. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Is the gentleman going to discuss present conditions with reference to independent water lines on the Pacific coast?

Mr. KNOWLAND. Yes; I am going into that.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. In competition with the transcontinental railroads?

Mr. KNOWLAND. Yes; I am going to take that up.

It may be urged that all this is ancient history and that similar practices have not been attempted in recent years. It is probably true that subsidies have not been paid. Under present laws the existence of such a railway pool would be impossible. It is charged, however, that indirectly the same results are now accomplished by the railroads as in the days when they resorted to more direct methods. About 1902 the Southern Pacific Railroad Co. obtained control of the Pacific Mail. This transcontinental railroad now holds 100,100 shares of the capital stock of the steamship company out of a total of 200,000 shares, a bare majority, but as effective for its purposes as if it held it all.

An analysis of the volume of freight moved by the Pacific Mail after the Southern Pacific acquired a controlling interest is significant. During the year 1903 the east-bound freight amounted to 28,882 tons. For a period of four or five years following 1902 the Pacific Mail had no opposition via the Isthmian route. The amount of freight carried eastward by this company gradually diminished, as shown by the records of the Panama Railroad Co., which I have before me, running down as low as 8,700 tons for the year 1909. There appears to have been no great effort put forth for east-bound freight. It is claimed that preference was always given to shipments for Central American ports. Twenty-six days was the schedule time between San Francisco and Panama, but the boats were generally late.

In January, 1909, the transcontinental railroads made a general and marked advance in freight rates which aroused Pacific coast shippers, causing them to look around for relief and impressing them with the necessity of obtaining genuine water competition. With the advance of the transcontinental rates the Pacific Mail, in conjunction with the Panama Railroad Co., owned by the Government of the United States, gave notice of an intended increase. The shippers of California, through Mr. William R. Wheeler, then Assistant Secretary of Commerce and Labor, protested against this synchronical and sympathetic advance on the part of the water carriers. The matter was taken before the Secretary of War, and his attention directed to the fact that the Panama Railroad Co. was purchasing ballast at Colon for its steamers for every trip north bound, but in face of this fact the management of this company had decided to raise rates and continue to buy ballast when a lower rate would have resulted in an increased freight movement, obviating the necessity of purchasing ballast. Secretary of War Wright, upon the showing made, directed that there be no advance in rates, and, as a matter of fact, a reduction was made, a flat rate of $8 per ton for all east-bound freight going into effect. This action, resulting in a greater differentiation between water and rail rates, making the water route more attractive to shippers, stimulated the east-bound freight movement, which increased in 1910 to 33,482 tons, as compared with 8,700 tons for the fiscal year ending June, 1909.

In 1911, with the California-Atlantic Steamship Line in the field, operated in genuine competition with the Pacific Mail, the east-bound freight movement for that fiscal year increased to 105,577 tons, of which the Pacific Mail carried 47,892 and the California-Atlantic 57,685 tons. This competing company put on a direct line of steamships to Panama, forcing the Pacific Mail to follow suit. Prior to this time it had taken the Pacific Mail steamers between 26 and 30 days to make the run to Panama owing to the numerous calls at Central American ports. With their direct line they cut the time to 12 days. The California-Atlantic Line was fast becoming too formidable a competitor and the necessity of driving this rival off the ocean became apparent. Casting about for an effective method it was determined to temporarily reduce rates to a figure that would be unprofitable, the railroad-owned line, backed by strong financial interests, being certain that it would survive the war. The Pacific Mail had always claimed that an $8 rate was unremunerative, but in face of all previous contentions the rate was lowered to $5.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Five dollars between what two points?

Mr. KNOWLAND. Between New York and San Francisco.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I was about to ask that, but the question of the gentleman from New York has covered the point on which I desired information.

Mr. KNOWLAND. This reduction to $5 resulted in a telegraphic protest from the traffic bureau of the Merchants' Exchange of San Francisco.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KNOWLAND. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The gentleman said the Southern Pacific Railroad proposed to put on through the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. a $5 rate for the purpose of crushing out the independent competitor—the California & Atlantic Steamship Co. I presume the gentleman will agree with me that a $5 rate would crush out the independent company.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I think it would have made it very hard for them to continue.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Will not the gentleman concede that that would be a hard rate for the transcontinental railroad?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I will ask the gentleman to defend the railroad in his own time.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Does the gentleman think the railroad could meet a $5 rate?

Mr. KNOWLAND. You will always find them able to take care of themselves.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Will the gentleman permit a further question?

Mr. KNOWLAND. Yes; if it is brief.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Wheeler said that an $8 a ton rate was satisfactory to our shippers, and no shipper, as far as my knowledge goes, has asked for a $5 a ton rate. Now, bearing in mind there was already an $8 per ton rate, the statement was further made by Mr. Wheeler that after the completion of the Panama Canal that the shipping traffic would not have to give up one-third——

Mr. KNOWLAND. Did the gentleman rise to ask a question or to repeat a part of his speech? I have promised certain time to gentlemen on this side, and I have only a given time. I am willing to yield for a short question at any time, but I do not want gentlemen to take up my time, not that I have any personal objection, but it will be taking the time of other gentlemen.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I will be as brief as possible; I have no desire to encroach on the gentleman's time with a long question. As I said, Mr. Wheeler stated that the water traffic would not have to give up one-third of the earnings to the railroad when the Panama Canal was completed. Now, the gentleman knows as well as I do that that means with free tolls of water transportation they could make a $5 rate through the Panama Canal.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I have not entered into the question of tolls; I am discussing section 11. The gentleman can discuss the question of tolls when we get to it. If he has anything to say on the railroad provision of the bill I would be glad to answer him.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I wanted to ask whether on that state of facts the railroads could meet that rate.

Mr. KNOWLAND. They will take care of themselves.

Responding to this appeal from the San Francisco Traffic Bureau, the Government of the United States, a connecting carrier, refused to allow this temporary reduction, the object of which was so palpable, and compensatory rates were established. With the canal completed and open to traffic and the United States no longer a cocarrier, the Government could not promptly and effectively meet a similar situation.

As the day approached for the Panama Canal to be opened to traffic it was to be expected that transcontinental railroad interests would study with the greatest care the probable effect of this all-water route upon transportation by rail. It was likewise realized that if the shrewd and farsighted men in control concluded that the canal was likely to become a dangerous competitor they would cast about for a method whereby its effect might be neutralized. That a carefully devised plan of neutralization has been determined upon is the opinion of commercial organizations on the Pacific coast and elsewhere, who have been keeping in close touch with the situation. This brings us to a discussion of the present-day activities of the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. and a study of its plans for a line of steamers to be operated through the canal.

This company, a majority of whose stock is held by the Southern Pacific Railroad, announces its intention of building four new steamers of 37,000 tons displacement, carrying about 500 passengers and 10,000 tons of freight, the cost of each steamer to be $3,000,000, a total investment for the four steamers of $12,000,000. These steamers, if built, are to operate between New York and Pacific coast ports through the canal, then proceed to the Hawaiian Islands, Japan, the Philippines, and finally Hongkong. The people of the Pacific coast do not object to railroad-owned steamships engaging in foreign trade, and a line to the Orient, to South America, or to any other foreign port is desirable, but they do emphatically protest against using this foreign line as an instrumentality to neutralize the beneficial effects of the Panama Canal as a competitor of the transcontinental railroads, which they fear is the purpose of the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. The evidence before our committee strengthens this belief. According to the managers of the Pacific Mail, the money centers of New York refuse to finance the building of these ships if Congress adopts any provision against railroad-controlled lines. We must not mention the word "railway" or Wall Street will not advance one dollar. The frankness of the vice president and general manager of the Pacific Mail, Mr. R. P. Schwerin, who appeared before our committee, was certainly commendable, although somewhat startling. Let me read from the testimony, so that the House may judge for itself as to the accuracy of my statements:

The CHAIRMAN. You don't propose to monopolize the ports and terminal facilities of any port in the world, or conspire with others to do that?

Mr. SCHWERIN. If I was big enough to do that I would be master of the world.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not your intention to do that?

Mr. SCHWERIN. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, if it is not, how can it hurt you if we simply enact a statute prohibiting those things only?

Mr. SCHWERIN. It won't hurt at all, Mr. Chairman, if you leave out the word "railway."

The CHAIRMAN. How can we distinguish between railroads or ships unless we say the railways, ships, or any other person or corporation?

Mr. SCHWERIN. That is all right, but leave out the word "railway."

* * * * * * *

The CHAIRMAN. Why strike out the word "railway," if you can get finances enough, if you are not guilty?

Mr. SCHWERIN. You can not build ships without money, sir.

* * * * * * *

Mr. CULLOP. Now, then, if they require that the word "railway" be left out of there, they mean to have some advantage by it. They mean to claim that a person, that some person or by some other name, lets the railroad escape. This puts the railroad in or any other person, association, or corporation.

Mr. HAMLIN. But if a railroad owns ships and does not violate the provisions of this act, it does not hurt them any.

Mr. SCHWERIN. You would not get any money under this bill.

Mr. HAMLIN. If a railroad intends to obey the law, then no reasonable man can assert that they will be hurt any by this law, can he?

Mr. SCHWERIN. I don't know, sir, whether you have tried to raise any money for a venture on the ocean, but my idea is this: That if there is anything in this bill that would cause any criticism as to the future safety of the investment, let the merit of the investment or its operation stand on the soundest basis, you will not interest capital. The fact that there is any doubt will make it an undesirable investment and unpopular with investors. Any American marine venture is doubtful enough in itself.

There are those who will be only too delighted if I fail. If I fail they will congratulate themselves, and I am here making this fight cleanly, as an American, to keep our flag on the ocean, and they do not want me to succeed.

Mr. HAMILTON. If you were divorced from the Southern Pacific Railroad—your company—couldn't you raise money just as well?

Mr. SCHWERIN. No, sir; I couldn't get $1.

* * * * * * *

Mr. CULLOP. Did you go to the people, in your application for a loan, who are interested in the Southern Pacific Railroad?

Mr. SCHWERIN. Interested in the railways of this country, I suppose, directly or indirectly. I haven't the slightest idea what their interests were in the railways.

This testimony is illuminative and should impress upon the House the wisdom of providing in this bill, as the committee has done, against the ownership by railroads of competing water lines. The provision does not debar railroads from owning steamships engaged in foreign trade. The inhibition applies only to water lines engaged in interstate commerce which compete for traffic with the railroads by which they are owned or controlled. Can it be questioned that a railroad controls a water line under these circumstances with any other object in view than to minimize competition?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KNOWLAND. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. What the gentleman has been saying has suggested a question to me that I have not seen discussed anywhere in any of these hearings, and that is, Is there anything in the bill now before the House that would prevent the Canadian Pacific Railway, which has its terminals at Boston and New York, and also at Seattle, as well as at Vancouver, from owning ships and running them through the canal? They already have several ships heavily subsidized by the British Government. Is there anything now that will prevent them from having the privilege that you propose to take away from a competitive American line? Perhaps I did not state that exactly, because they would not be permitted to stop on the coast, but on the line that you propose they could start from Vancouver, bring their vessels around through the canal, come to New York, load from their own wharf, and go back the other way, which is practically a coastwise trade.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Of course, no Canadian line can enter directly into coastwise trade. I have heard the same question raised that the gentleman has just asked. My answer to that would be this: We have a condition in our own country to meet first, and I believe that we should now face that situation. If in the future it develops that Canadian railroad-owned lines are doing the same things that our railroads have done in the past, I believe then Congress can meet the situation which then arises, but for the present I think that we should at least see that our own house is set in order and that our shippers are protected. In my opinion, section 11 covers Canadian railroad-owned steamship lines, as these lines all come under our Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Does not the gentleman think that we ought in this bill at the same time make the same prohibition against foreign railroads that we do against our own?

Mr. KNOWLAND. Some question our right to do it under the treaties. There is no question as to our right to regulate our own interstate commerce, and let us do at once that about which there is no question.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNOWLAND. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I need not say that I am thoroughly in accord with the purpose of this amendment, as the gentleman knows from our past conversations, but is there anything in this section 11 that will prevent the same individuals from organizing and owning stock of a railway company, on the one hand, and organizing and owning stock of a ship line, on the other? Is there any way of preventing that?

Mr. KNOWLAND. If the gentleman will read the bill, I think he will find there is. As I recall it, it provides against stock ownership also. That is correct, is it not, I will ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS]?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. The language is:

By stock ownership or otherwise, either directly, indirectly, through any holding company, or in any other manner.

Mr. HARDY. But that is an inhibition that is directed solely to the company, and the same stockholders may be the owners of both companies. You prevent a railway company from owning stock in a water line, but you do not prevent the same stockholders that own stock in a railway company from owning stock in a water line.

Mr. KNOWLAND. We prevent any control, directly or indirectly; and I think that would cover it. As far as I am personally concerned, if the gentleman can frame any amendment that would strengthen the language, I should be very glad to give it my support.

Mr. HARDY. I am afraid your language is so indirect that it will not affect the purpose.

Mr. KNOWLAND. If the gentleman can make it any stronger, he will have my support.

Mr. RAKER. The proposed amendment reads as follows:

From and after the 1st day of July, 1913, it shall be unlawful for any railroad company or other common carrier subject to the act to regulate commerce to own, lease, operate, control, or have any interest whatsoever (by stock ownership or otherwise, either directly, indirectly, through any holding company, or in any other manner).

Would not that cover just the things the gentleman has suggested?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I am inclined to believe that it would.

Mr. HARDY. I will study over that and see if I can not improve the language, but I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Would that mean that an ordinary man could not own a little stock in one company and still have a little in the other?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I do not think that it goes as far as that.

Mr. HARDY. Just one moment. I do not think that a railroad company would be owning an interest in a ship line because one of its stockholders owned an interest in a ship line; and if the railroad company would not be owning any interest in a ship line because its president owned an interest, then it would not own it by stockholders, because the railroad does not own what its stockholders own.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I hope the gentleman will give that careful study and correct it if he can.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] did not read all of the provision upon this subject, and I will insert the section:

From and after the 1st day of July, 1913, it shall be unlawful for any railroad company or other common carrier subject to the act to regulate commerce to own, lease, operate, control, or have any interest whatsoever (by stock ownership or otherwise, either directly, indirectly, through any holding company, or in any other manner) in any common carrier by water with which said railroad or other carrier aforesaid does or may compete for traffic; and in case of the violation of this provision each day in which such violation continues shall be deemed a separate offense.

Mr. KNOWLAND. It is claimed that the Pacific Mail Line would be in competition with other water lines operating through the canal, and consequently could not stifle competition. With the knowledge that one of the most powerful transcontinental railroads controlled a line of fast steamers of large carrying capacity and with the history of the throttling of water competition on the Pacific coast during the past 35 years fresh in mind, would investment in a competing line through the canal be attractive? How long would the opposing line survive a rate war?

It has been suggested that to place all water carriers under the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission would solve the problem of regulating Panama Canal traffic, and I will say, in justice to Mr. Schwerin, that he is willing that the steamers of the Pacific Mail be placed under the jurisdiction of the commission. This suggestion opens up a big question. There has always been strong opposition on the part of shippers against placing water lines in port-to-port traffic under the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission. In attempting to regulate water rates the commission would find conditions vastly dissimilar to those which obtain as to rail rates. Railroads must secure rights of way, and the building of a road, exclusive even of its equipment when completed, involves the expenditure of millions of dollars. Conditions make railroads natural monopolies. They control the rails. When in former years they combined and fixed rates the public had no redress. In marked contrast the ocean is an open highway. No right of way can be obtained. Steamers can be chartered with small capital. The movement of crops and many other conditions influence charters. The tramp is an important factor.

For the commission to attempt to regulate rates under these varying conditions would present almost insurmountable difficulties. Having in mind conditions likely to arise with the opening of the canal, with special reference to the governmental control of railroad-owned ships, the President recently referred to the commission the question of placing water carriers under its jurisdiction, hoping this might solve the problem. It was the unanimous opinion of the commission that the most effective way of meeting the situation would be by a statute prohibiting the ownership by railroads of water lines with which they compete for traffic. Under these conditions it seems to me that Congress can well afford to accept the recommendation of the commission, which, through long experience in dealing with these problems, is better qualified to pass intelligent judgment upon the questions involved than any other body or individual.

In discussing section 11 I have dealt with the situation in California only, but it is well known that in many other sections of the country similar conditions exist, and there could be cited innumerable illustrations on the Great Lakes, the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, and along our largest rivers where railroads are controlling water lines with but a single object in view. It seems to me that conditions throughout the country warrant legislation as drastic as proposed. With the opening of the canal the necessity increases. The hour is at hand for the announcement of a definite policy on the part of the Government of the United States relating to the control of competing water lines by railroads. [Applause.]

While the minority in its report has set forth at some length its views favoring free tolls for American ships engaged in commerce between the States, I nevertheless desire before concluding to briefly discuss several phases of this important question. It is a fact worthy of the notice of the House and country that in all the wide discussion touching our right, under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, to favor our coastwise ships in the matter of tolls, that the only voices raised to question this right have been those of Americans. Every department of this Government from which an expression has been had upholds the position of the minority in its interpretation of the treaty. If Members will examine the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 25, 1911, a little over one year ago, which contains the debate upon the question of our right to fortify the canal, they will find that this same Hay-Pauncefote treaty was then conveniently quoted, and the assertion made by speaker after speaker opposed to the policy of fortification, that by the language of this treaty with Great Britain we had surrendered our right to fortify the Panama Canal, built by American money and American skill and upon what is practically American soil.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. May I interrupt the gentleman a moment?

Mr. KNOWLAND. Yes.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Is there anything in that debate showing that at the time of the negotiation and ratification of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty that Secretary Hay, on behalf of the United States, and the British foreign office, through the foreign minister, Lord Lansdowne, both agreed, under the treaty as it stands, the United States did have a right to fortify?

Mr. KNOWLAND. That was disputed in the debate. I have the Senate document, published several years ago, which contains copies of the correspondence between the representatives of the United States and Great Britain, and I find no such acknowledgment on the part of England of our right to fortify.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I presume the gentleman would like me to put the language in the RECORD?

Mr. KNOWLAND. In the gentleman's own speech.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I will do that.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Gen. Keifer, for instance, a former and able Member of this body, who led the fight against the erection of fortifications, after calling attention to the action of the Senate in voting down several amendments while the treaty was pending reserving to this Government the right to fortify, said:

Nothing can be more conclusive of the Senate's understanding and desire that this treaty forbid fortifications, even though the canal should be built at the expense of the United States.

But we are now fortifying the canal, for Congress wisely decided by a large majority upon that policy. Again we find that Americans, not Englishmen, are flaunting this same treaty in our faces and proclaiming that we have by this instrument waived our right to regulate our domestic commerce. By the provisions of this bill, as has been clearly pointed out, we hasten, for fear that some doubt may exist in our favor, to declare in express terms that we surrender even before we are asked. Such an attitude seems indefensible. [Applause.]

For the benefit of our American friends who appear so anxious to interpret the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to mean that we are estopped from favoring American coastwise shipping in the matter of canal dues, I desire to quote some British authorities who take directly the opposite view. The London Morning Post, one of the leading papers of Great Britain, early in January of this year published a series of articles dealing with the question of canal tolls, taking the ground that there was a question as to whether our Government had the right under the treaty to favor American ships in the foreign trade.

As to the coastwise trade, our right, they declared, was unquestioned. Editorially this paper said:

The proposal—the free use of the canal to American ships in the coastwise trade—does not really concern other countries, since the coasting trade of the United States is already restricted to native shipping.

Probably the most eminent British authority in shipping matters, Sir Owen Philipps, president of the combined British steamship lines, including the Royal Mail, the Pacific Steam Navigation Co., and Lambert & Holt, all engaged in business with the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of South America, said in an interview:

As regards American ships trading exclusively between United States ports on the Atlantic and the ports of that country on the Pacific—trade which is exclusively confined to steamers built in the United States—British vessels would not be adversely affected if in this case United States ships were allowed to pass through the canal free of dues.

Another English shipping expert, who did not desire his name used, was quoted in the Post as follows:

Practically all the American shipping is now engaged in the coastwise business, and whether they are able to carry goods a little cheaper does not matter to us in the least. Any reduction in the canal dues—

Now mark carefully the words which follow, for, in my opinion, they prove that this Englishman was exceptionally well posted as to conditions in the United States and familiar with the real influences at work—will only enable the shippers to compete with the transcontinental railways of the United States. That, I believe, is the point of the whole thing.

If the shipping interests of England are not complaining, as these articles in the London Post go to prove, why such anxiety in the United States? What influences are so solicitous over "our solemn treaty obligations"? I need not answer.

In the early history of railroad building this Government, in an effort to encourage capital to construct lines across the continent and thus bring the Atlantic and Pacific coasts into closer commercial and political union, made enormous land grants to these transcontinental railroads; the Union Pacific and the various branches receiving, according to the Department of the Interior, 19,136,991.84 acres. The Central Pacific Co. received 6,300,865.69 acres; the Sioux City & Pacific Co., 42,601.95; and the Northern Pacific, 33,279,866.99, a grand total for these transcontinental roads of 58,760,326.47 acres, the present value of which runs into the billions. I am not criticizing the policy of the Government in making these grants, for the building of the roads was necessary, and without this aid would unquestionably have been postponed, but a charge emanating from these sources that free tolls would be a Government subsidy to shippers and shipowners comes with poor grace. [Applause.]

The minority contends that there is no more excuse or reason for charging a toll upon American ships that will pass through the canal engaged in commerce between the States than to impose a charge upon American craft using the waterways of the country upon which our Government has expended $627,098,236 in improving. In this connection I wish to publicly commend the consistency of one Member who joined in the majority report, Mr. MARTIN of Colorado, for on March 20, after the majority report had been submitted and coincidently upon the very day that the views of the minority were presented, he introduced House bill 22142, which I hold in my hand, providing for the levying of a toll upon all water craft, excepting only rowboats, making use of any navigable waters of the United States upon which the Government has heretofore expended or shall hereafter expend money upon improvements. He includes rivers, harbors, lakes, bays, and creeks, as well as canals. If we are going to inaugurate this policy at Panama, then why not pass Mr. MARTIN'S bill? We will at least be consistent.

Some of our friends from the interior express alarm lest free tolls would benefit the Coast and Gulf States, or those immediately adjacent, to the disadvantage of their sections. This argument has been advanced for the purpose of arraying the interior of the country against the proposed policy. In my opinion no Representative from an interior State can read the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission in what is known as the Reno case without becoming convinced that the history of rate making as reviewed in that report bears out the contention that water rates are invariably reflected into the interior. On page 355 of that report (Opinion No. 1623) the commission says:

It is the admission of the carriers themselves that the rates which they make from Chicago to the Pacific coast terminals are established in order that the manufacturers and jobbers of the West may compete on a level with the jobbers and manufacturers who have the advantage of a location on the Atlantic seaboard.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Does not the gentleman know that the whole system of rates has practically been abolished by the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I do not. Rates will continue to be regulated by water competition, regardless of their decision.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Did not the Interstate Commerce Commission state in its report and in its decision made only a few weeks ago that the whole system of blanket rates will be practically abolished under the long-and-short-haul clause? And if that is true, the gentleman himself must realize the railroads can not reduce their coast rates to compete with the water rates.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I do not think there is any doubt in the world the railroads will always meet the water rates, as they have for the past 30 or 40 years.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Does the gentleman think that the intermediate territory, the mountain territory, the interior territory, is going to permit the coast to recoup by making higher rates into the interior?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I know this: We are now shipping by water from New York into Montana by using water and rail, and the lower the toll rate the greater will be the advantage to the interior. We can get along on the coast. The toll will affect the interior country and determine how much benefit they will receive from the Panama Canal.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Does not the gentleman know that that very class of rates are those that have been condemned by the Interstate Commerce Commission as contrary to the long-and-short-haul clause, and they will not be allowed to continue, and will be abolished before the Panama Canal will have any effect?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I think the gentleman is in error.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. All the gentleman has to do is to read the decision in the case.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I have read the decision very carefully.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The gentleman speaks of shipping as far east as Montana. I want to call attention to the fact that we are now sending certain products down the coast, across the Isthmus, up to Philadelphia, and back as far west as Duluth, to compete with rail rates from Seattle to that point—back to the center of the country.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Again, on page 364 of this same opinion:

From the date of the first transcontinental tariff that we have upon the files of the commission Chicago has never paid a higher rate to reach a Pacific coast terminal than has New York, either upon classes or commodities. The water competition of the seaboard has never been strong enough since 1887 to compel a reduction of rates from New York which the lines out of Chicago did not feel fully justified in meeting at that point.

Many manufactured articles that would find a Pacific coast market are not produced directly on the Atlantic or Gulf coasts, but at interior points, and the rate of toll might be a determining factor in making it possible to reach these markets. Pacific coast products, including citrus fruits, could reach interior points at reduced freight rates with free tolls, to the advantage of the consumer. I will frankly admit that any toll within reason would probably not prevent the two coasts from using this water route. But the toll may limit the opportunity of the producer or manufacturer in the interior to reach the coast, or, on the other hand, to purchase certain water-borne products.

It is claimed that a toll of $1 per net register ton would amount to only between 40 or 50 cents an actual ton, and would be such a small tax as to be negligible. This line of reasoning is tantamount to a declaration that a tax is not a burden, and I am inclined to refer this question to my Democratic colleagues in the hopes of starting something. In this connection, however, I would call attention to the fact that all ships will be charged upon their net registered tonnage, and that in many instances, according to figures which I have obtained, they go to sea loaded to less than their net register capacity, and this would increase the toll proportionately upon the freight actually carried. In short, the figures which I have obtained refute the statement that a rate per net registered ton would result in a lower rate for freight actually carried. At $1 per net registered ton, according to these figures furnished me by one of the witnesses who testified before our committee, of sailings from Boston, it is shown that this rate, instead of amounting to but 50 cents per actual ton, averages from $1.25 to $2.50 per ton of freight carried.

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman will permit, I want to know if it is a fact that the net registered tonnage is only about half the average tonnage of the commodities carried in a ship.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I think that is entirely incorrect. For instance, you take in a case of lemons and oranges——

Mr. MADDEN. I am talking about the average now.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I have a list here which I will put in the RECORD, which shows that, taken on the average, the ships—and this is a list of those sailing from Boston—carried less actual cargo than their net register capacity.

The tabulation is here given:

Line.	Year.	Number of sailings.	Net registered tonnage.	Average cargo carried.	Assumed rate per net register ton.	Corresponding rate per ton weight carried.
Cunard	1909	27	9,075	3,790	$1.00	$2.50
Cunard (8 months)	1910 / 1911	28	9,075 / 11,200	4,000	1.00	+2.50
Warren	1910	16	3,275	3,405	1.00	.95
Leyland, Liverpool	1910	62	6,100	4,586	1.00	1.32
White Star, Liverpool	1910	27	8,000	2,830	1.00	2.82
Leyland, London	1910	35	3,500	3,000	1.00	1.17
Leyland, Manchester	1910	24	3,210	2,800	1.00	1.14

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNOWLAND. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. The net registered tonnage is based upon the basis of 100 cubic feet, is it not, to the registered ton?

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. It is exactly 100 cubic feet.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Did not our expert witnesses, Dr. Johnston and Mr. Chamberlain, of the Bureau of Navigation, and other witnesses, substantially agree that the net registry ton of 100 cubic feet, with an average cargo, meant practically double that tonnage in actual cargo?

Mr. KNOWLAND. They said in some cases—if the ship was full. If it was not full, you would pay on the net register capacity of the ship. There are many other commodities on which it costs more for each ton because of the bulk. For instance, on pig iron you could get more tons in a net registered tonnage of a ship's space.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Is this not a fair synopsis of the testimony, that, taking one tonnage with the other and in the passing of commerce the ships in usual course, they carry practically double the tonnage of actual freight represented by the net registered tonnage?

Mr. KNOWLAND. That was Dr. Johnston's statement.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Was there any dispute of that in the testimony?

Mr. KNOWLAND. There was none of us who knew anything about it.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. And Mr. Chamberlain said the same thing.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Practical operation is what we have to consider, and I have taken an average of ships, which I think is a good test.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. You have taken certain ships that are satisfactory to your side?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I have taken actual ratings from Boston.

Mr. ESCH. In view of the fact that citrous fruits are now being shipped by fast routes and can be diverted en route, do you anticipate that much citrous fruit will be carried between the Atlantic and Pacific seaboards by sea?

Mr. KNOWLAND. They figure there will be a considerable amount carried in vessels which have cold-storage facilities. There may not be as much as many people imagine, I admit, but there will be a large movement in vessels properly equipped, and the fruit will reach a territory quite a way inland.

Mr. ESCH. But it would be rather confined to the coast lines, would it not?

Mr. KNOWLAND. It would reach quite a way into the interior, I think.

Mr. ESCH. You know that you can go a good many miles in a day by fast freight.

Mr. KNOWLAND. You would have a diversion from New Orleans, which would supply a large southern country; and from Boston, and from Philadelphia.

Congress at this session will consider no legislation of greater importance or more far-reaching in its effect. The bill provides for the operation of this great canal, the most gigantic engineering project of the age, and upon the form of the legislation will depend in some measure at least the success, commercially, of this mighty enterprise. It is generally conceded that we can expect little from our foreign trade under present conditions, for we have practically no ships. To-day we carry scarcely 9 per cent of our ocean commerce, foreign ships carrying 91 per cent. We have some coastwise shipping which we should seek to increase, but there are those who would destroy even this remnant of a decadent merchant marine. The pending legislation, in the opinion of many who have given careful study to this question, offers an opportunity for Congress to aid our merchant marine and in small measure at least revive the shipbuilding industry. This can be done, and the revenues from the canal, as has been clearly shown by the testimony, be still sufficient to pay more than double the expenses of operation and maintenance. It is squarely up to Congress whether we will grant to the United States the fullest possible measure of advantage incident to the opening of this American canal or permit foreign nations to reap all the benefits, conceding to them now, as we must, the greater share. I am proud to raise my voice and cast my vote in favor of according to American citizens every opportunity the canal offers for the development of domestic or foreign commerce, and if a doubt exists, as some contend, touching our right under the treaty to so favor our own citizens, instead of voluntarily coming down and surrendering, like Davy Crockett's coon, I for one would at the outset give to the United States the benefit of the doubt. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman a question right there as to the statement which he makes to the effect that he is in favor of giving equal opportunity to every American citizen, in view of his opposition to allowing ships owned by railroads to pass through the Panama Canal.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I would not be in favor of treating any American citizen equally if I thought he was endeavoring to stifle legitimate competition.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman has no right to suppose anybody would do that.

Mr. KNOWLAND. The resolutions and telegrams are as follows:

RESOLUTIONS AND TELEGRAMS INDICATING PUBLIC SENTIMENT THROUGHOUT THE COUNTRY IN FAVOR OF FREE TOLLS THROUGH THE PANAMA CANAL FOR AMERICAN SHIPS ENGAGED IN COASTWISE TRADE AND AGAINST THE USE OF THE CANAL BY STEAMSHIP LINES ENGAGED IN INTERSTATE COMMERCE WHICH ARE OWNED OR CONTROLLED BY RAILROADS WITH WHICH THEY COMPETE FOR TRAFFIC.

Resolutions unanimously adopted by the Lakes-to-the-Gulf Deep Waterways Association at the sixth annual convention, Chicago, Ill., October 12, 13, 14, 1911:

"The policy of free waterways is fundamental with the American people, and hence this association declares that this principle should be extended to our coastwise trade through the Panama Canal."

Resolutions unanimously adopted by the National Rivers and Harbors Congress which convened in Washington in December, 1911, consisting of over 1,200 delegates, representing every State in the Union:

"We submit that waterways improved or created by the Federal Government by the use of money contributed by the whole people of the United States should be free for the use of American ships in fair and open competition and on equal terms, without the payment of tolls, but we contend that a water carrier owned, controlled, or operated by a competing land carrier is unfair competition, and in order to preserve to the whole people the benefits of continued fair competition so that the beneficent influence of open waterways shall not be nullified by hostile interests, we recommend the enlargement of the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, to the end that the commission may more effectually regulate competing land and water carriers and competing water carriers and provide for the interchange of traffic."

Resolutions adopted at a meeting held in Washington December 6, 1911, composed of delegates representing civic and commercial bodies of the Pacific coast, cities on the Gulf of Mexico and the Atlantic coast, and the cities of Philadelphia, Newark, Trenton, Richmond, Buffalo, St. Louis, Cincinnati, and Pittsburgh:

"Whereas the Government of the United States is constructing, entirely at its own cost, the Panama Canal for the benefit of its own people as a military measure for the naval protection of either coast in time of war, and for the facilitation of its domestic commerce as well as for the furtherance of the commerce of the world;

"Whereas the coastwise commerce between ports of the United States is confined by law to vessels registered under the American flag, so that regulations established by the Government of the United States for the use of the canal by such vessels will not conflict in any way with the treaty obligations of the United States with other nations, and particularly with Great Britain;

"Whereas there is a great and growing demand for cheaper and freer interchange of commodities between the States of the Pacific slope, on the one hand, and those bordering on and tributary to the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, including all the States along the Mississippi and its navigable branches, on the other;

"Whereas the opening of the canal, through the continuous and direct water transportation it will afford, will give the people of this country opportunities to interchange commodities of the different districts to an extent never dreamed of before, and thus will reduce the cost of a large number of articles of daily use and necessity to the consumer;

"Whereas ample precedents exist for exempting the domestic commerce of the United States from the payment of tolls for passage through the canal; and

"Whereas the operation of the canal under this condition will greatly stimulate and increase American shipping:

"Resolved, That the conference for Panama Canal free tolls for American coastwise commerce strongly and urgently recommends that vessels engaged in domestic commerce between ports of the United States shall be granted free passage through the Panama Canal."

The Boston Chamber of Commerce adopted resolutions similar to the above.

Resolutions passed by delegates representing the various chambers of commerce of the Pacific coast held in San Francisco, Cal., October 2, 1911:

"Whereas the building of the Panama Canal was undertaken by the people of the United States in pursuance of a great national policy, amongst other things of providing for the national defense, of opening up the shortest possible water route between the respective coasts of the United States and foreign countries, to provide through natural methods and to prevent monopoly of transportation means for transportation between the various sections of the Union at the lowest possible cost, to build up and expand our commerce with foreign nations, and, incidentally, to encourage the upbuilding of a now decadent merchant marine: Be it

"Resolved, That it is the sense of this meeting that there should be no tolls charged through the canal to vessels coastwise flying the American flag; and be it further

"Resolved, That we heartily approve of the legislation recommended by President Taft in his message to Congress of December 6, 1910, reading as follows: 'I can not close this reference to the canal without suggesting as a wise amendment to the interstate-commerce law a provision prohibiting interstate-commerce railroads from owning or controlling ships engaged in the trade through the Panama Canal. I believe such a provision may be needed to save to the people of the United States the benefits of the competition in trade between the eastern and western seaboards which this canal was constructed to secure.'"

Resolutions adopted at the forty-second annual meeting of the National Board of Trade, Washington, D. C., January 18, 1912:

"Whereas the Government of the United States is constructing, entirely at its own cost, the Panama Canal, for the benefit of its own people, as a military measure for the naval protection of either coast in time of war, and for facilitating its domestic and foreign commerce, as well as for the furtherance of the commerce of the world;

"Whereas the coastwise commerce between ports of the United States is confined by law to vessels registered under the American flag, so that regulations established by the Government of the United States for the use of the canal by such vessels will not conflict in any way with the treaty obligations of the United States with other nations;

"Whereas there is a great and growing demand for cheaper and freer interchange of commodities between the States of the Pacific slope on the one hand and those bordering on and tributary to the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, including all the States along the Mississippi and its navigable branches, on the other;

"Whereas the opening of the canal, through the continuous and direct water transportation it will afford, will give the people of this country opportunities to interchange commodities of the different districts to an extent heretofore found impossible, and thus will reduce the cost of a large number of articles of daily use and necessity;

"Resolved, That the National Board of Trade urgently recommends that vessels engaged in domestic commerce between ports of the United States shall be granted preferential tolls in passing through the Panama Canal: Provided, That when such vessels are owned, controlled, or operated, directly or indirectly, by any land transportation line or lines, no preferential tolls shall be granted to the vessels so owned, operated, or controlled."

Resolutions adopted by the Navy League of the United States at convention held in city of Washington, February 23, 1912:

"Whereas the building of the Panama Canal was undertaken by the people of the United States in pursuance of a great national policy—amongst other things of providing for the national defense; of opening up the shortest possible water route between the respective coasts of the United States and foreign countries; and of encouraging the upbuilding of our merchant marine, which has practically disappeared from the foreign trade: Be it

"Resolved, That although it is the sense of this meeting that the question of tolls through the Panama Canal is one beyond the scope of this league's present activities, yet be it further

"Resolved, That as we believe the war-time efficiency of our Navy will depend, in part, on the existence of a fleet of merchant vessels available as naval auxiliaries, we heartily approve of any legislation directly or indirectly aiding in building up the American merchant marine, and we believe that if Congress in its wisdom, deems it advisable to levy tolls, that these tolls should be returned to the ships, either in the coastwise or foreign trade, for the purpose of assisting in rehabilitating that merchant marine."

Resolution adopted by Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce, December 14, 1911:

"Whereas the Government of the United States is constructing, entirely at its own cost, the Panama Canal for the benefit of its own people as a military measure for the naval protection of either coast in the time of war and for the facilitation of its domestic commerce as well as for the furtherance of the commerce of the world;

"Whereas the coastwise commerce between the ports of the United States is confined by law to vessels registered under the American flag, so that regulations established by the Government of the United States for the use of the canal by such vessels will not conflict in any way with the treaty obligations of the United States with other nations;

"Whereas there is a great and growing demand for cheaper and freer interchange of commodities between the States of the Pacific slope on the one hand and those bordering on and tributary to the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, including all the States along the Mississippi and its navigable branches, on the other;

"Whereas the opening of the canal, through the continuous and direct water transportation it will afford, will give the people of this country opportunities to interchange commodities of the different districts to an extent never contemplated before, and thus will reduce the cost of a large number of articles of daily use and necessity;

"Whereas ample precedents exist for exempting the domestic commerce of the United States from the payment of tolls for passage through the canal; and

"Whereas the operation of the canal under this condition will greatly stimulate and increase American shipping:

"Resolved, That the Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce urgently recommends that vessels engaged in domestic commerce between ports of the United States shall be granted free passage through the Panama Canal."

Resolutions adopted by commercial bodies of the State of Washington, November 3, 1911:

"Whereas the building of the Panama Canal was undertaken by the people of the United States in pursuance of a great national policy, amongst other things to provide for the national defense; to open up the shortest possible water route between the ports of the United States and between the United States and foreign countries; to prevent monopoly of means of transportation between the various sections of the Union; and to provide such transportation to the people of the United States at the lowest possible cost; to build up and expand commerce with foreign nations; and, incidentally, to encourage the upbuilding of a now decadent merchant marine; and

"Whereas it is of the utmost importance to the State of Washington, and to all the States bordering on the Pacific Ocean, that their products—lumber, shingles, salmon, fruits, hops, wool, and other products—be most widely distributed at the least possible expense throughout the United States: Now therefore be it

"Resolved by the following civic bodies of the State of Washington, viz: The New Seattle Chamber of Commerce, the Tacoma Commercial Club and Chamber of Commerce, the Olympia Chamber of Commerce, the Bellingham Chamber of Commerce, the Everett Chamber of Commerce, the Port Townsend Commercial Club, the Aberdeen Chamber of Commerce, the Hoquiam Chamber of Commerce, the Bremerton Commercial Club, the Raymond Commercial Club, through their representatives in conference assembled, That there should be no tolls charged through the Panama Canal to vessels flying the American flag engaged in coastwise traffic of the United States; and be it further

"Resolved, That we heartily approve of the legislation recommended by President Taft in his message to Congress of December 6, 1910, reading as follows: 'I can not close this reference to the canal without suggesting as a wise amendment to the interstate commerce laws a provision prohibiting interstate-commerce railroads from owning or controlling ships engaged in the trade through the Panama Canal. I believe such a provision may be needed to save to the people of the United States the benefits of the competition in trade between the eastern and western seaboards which this canal was constructed to secure.' Be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to each Senator and Representative of the States west of the Rocky Mountains and of the States bordering on the Atlantic and Gulf of Mexico and of the States in the Mississippi and Missouri River Valleys, and that these resolutions be accompanied by a request to the Senators and Representatives of the State of Washington to support and vote for such arrangement of tolls."

Resolutions adopted by New Orleans Progressive Union, February 9, 1912:

"(1) The New Orleans Progressive Union indorses the proposition that American vessels engaged in coastwise trade shall pay no tolls in passing through the Panama Canal.

"(2) Should it be found necessary that American ships engaged in foreign trade shall pay tollage, the United States Government, by drawback, rebate, or otherwise, shall refund amount to such American vessels.

"(3) In the fixing of tolls for vessels passing through the Panama Canal the President shall have the right to reduce tolls to meet competition or other conditions that may arise, after 90 days' notice.

"(4) If the conditions at any time be found that the canal should be entirely free, that the rebate referred to in section 2 shall nevertheless continue to American vessels."

Resolutions adopted by Central Labor Council of Portland, Oreg., October 10, 1911:

"Resolved, That it is the sense of this meeting that there should be no tolls charged through the canal to vessels coastwise flying the American flag; and be it further

"Resolved, That we approve of amendments to the present interstate-commerce laws provisions prohibiting railroads under their jurisdiction from owning or controlling ships engaged in the trade through the Panama Canal, to the effect that the people of the United States may have the benefits resulting in competition between the Atlantic and Pacific seaboards, for which purpose this canal was primarily intended."

Resolutions adopted by the Merchants' Association of New York, March 5, 1912:

"Whereas the United States, by act of Congress, passed in 1884, made the following declaration of policy regarding tolls or charges relative to waterways acquired or constructed by the Federal Government: 'No tolls or operating charges shall be levied upon or collected from any vessel, dredge, or other water craft for passing through any lock, canal, canalized river, or other work for the use of and benefit of navigation now belonging to the United States, or that may be hereafter acquired or constructed'; and

"Whereas, under that policy, which is still in operation, the United States has expended on local waterway developments nearly $700,000,000 at the general expense of the whole country; and

"Whereas the Federal Government, in addition to its vast expenditures of public funds upon internal and seacoast waterways, for the use and benefit of all sections and of all the people, free from imposition of tolls or charges for the use thereof, has also made vast grants of public lands of incalculable present value to the transcontinental railways to promote their construction and the interests of the whole country, especially of the sections which they directly serve; and

"Whereas the Panama Canal is constructed primarily because of the military and economic necessities of the entire United States, and when completed will be of direct commercial benefit to a larger area of the country than any other waterway ever constructed or improved by the Federal Government; and

"Whereas the extension of the general policy of freedom from tolls to the domestic coastwise commerce of the United States passing through the Panama Canal can not create a discrimination against any other nation or its citizens or subjects in respect to the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise because of the fact that no such nation has been or now is permitted by law to engage in such coastwise commerce, which law was in operation and contemplation at the time of the negotiation and ratification of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty; and

"Whereas the provision of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty appears to relate to the avoidance of discriminations between the nations and therefore does not pertain to our domestic coastwise trade, in the treatment of which there can be no such discrimination as prohibited in said treaty: Now therefore be it

"Resolved, That the report of the special committee on tolls on coastwise commerce passing through the Panama Canal, dated February 26, 1912, be and hereby is approved; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Merchants' Association of New York opposes the proposition of imposing any tolls whatsoever upon the domestic coastwise commerce of the United States passing through the Panama Canal, unless it be determined, by competent authority, that the imposing of such tolls is required in fulfillment of our treaty obligations."

Resolutions adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, March 7, 1912:

"Resolved, That the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York earnestly urges the President of the United States and the Congress, while honorably carrying out all existing treaties or obligations entered into with foreign countries, to arrange the tolls on the Panama Canal so as to carefully protect American interests, and bring about the upbuilding of our merchant marine; and that we advocate, as a measure to this end, that the rates of toll on vessels engaged in the coastal trade shall be not over one-third the rates charged on vessels engaged in deep-sea business, or free if necessary to accomplish purposes desired.

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the President, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and to all Members of the United States Senate and the House of Representatives."

Resolutions adopted by the Maritime Association of the port of New York, July 12, 1911:

"Whereas, from present indications, the Panama Canal will be ready for use by merchant shipping in about two years' time; and

"Whereas it is necessary that those contemplating the operation of vessels through the canal should be informed at the earliest possible moment regarding the regulations that will govern said operation, so that sufficient time will be given to conform with every requirement: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That Congress be strongly urged to enact at this session such legislation as will enable the President to fix the tolls to be charged for the use of the canal, it being the consensus of opinion of this committee that in the fixing of said tolls American vessels should be exempted from all charges."

Resolutions adopted by the New York Board of Trade and Transportation, December 13, 1911:

"Whereas the Panama Canal is being constructed by the United States Government and the people of the United States are paying the whole cost thereof, and will be obliged to pay the cost of maintenance and repairs, whether the revenues are adequate or not; and

"Whereas the people of the United States have entered upon this great work chiefly for the benefit that it will be to our own commerce; and

"Whereas the construction of the Panama Canal by the United States will not give to the American people the full measure of benefits they are entitled to if our commerce is compelled to pay the same tolls that other peoples are required to pay: Therefore

"Resolved, That we petition the Government and Congress of the United States to give the most serious consideration to the enactment of laws declaring commerce between American ports passing through the Panama Canal as coastwise commerce of the United States and free of tolls, and if treaty provisions or commercial conventions which have provisions for termination by notice from either party will permit, to also consider the making of the Panama Canal free to all vessels of American registry."

Resolutions adopted by the resolutions committee of the Waterway Conference of the Southern Commercial Congress, and unanimously approved and adopted by the Southern Commercial Congress at its convention at Nashville, Tenn., on April 10, 1912:

"We favor the adoption of a law by Congress granting the use of the Panama Canal to American ships engaged in coastwise commerce free of toll and the prevention of the use of the canal by any steamship line owned or controlled by a railway or any monopolistic interest.

"We favor such legislation as is necessary to induce the construction of a merchant marine for the United States and the carrying of American commerce in American ships under the American flag."

Resolution adopted by Board of Trade of Tampa, Fla.:

"Whereas the Government of the United States has expended nearly $700,000,000 for the improvement of rivers and harbors and the construction of canals, and by act of Congress, passed 1884, declared as follows: 'No tolls or operating charges shall be levied upon or collected from any vessel, dredge, or other water craft for passing through any lock, canal, canalized river, or other work for the use and benefit of navigation now belonging to the United States, or that may be hereafter acquired or constructed'; and

"Whereas the Panama Canal was built by American money, American genius, and American enterprise, and with the understanding by the American people that the canal would be operated for their benefit, primarily because of the military and economic necessities of the entire United States and for commercial benefit of the whole country; and

"Whereas the imposition of tolls or charges for the use thereof of American boats engaged in American commerce would in many instances prohibit the shipping of American products from coast to coast, the interchange of products of the Pacific and the Atlantic and the Gulf, therefore defeating the very ends for which the American people indorsed the tremendous project and the expenditure of nearly a half billion of American dollars in the building of the Panama Canal: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the board of governors of the Board of Trade of Tampa, Fla., in session April 24, 1912, That we object and protest in strongest terms against this language in section 5 of the House bill 21969: 'No preference shall be given nor discrimination shown, directly or indirectly, to the vessels of any nation, its citizens or its subjects, other than to vessels belonging to the Government of the United States.' And be it further

"Resolved, That this section of the bill be so amended that preferential treatment may be accorded American vessels of commerce, or at least those engaged in the coastwise trade; and be it further

MARCH 16, 1912.

RECOMMENDATIONS OF RAILROAD COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA IN RE PANAMA CANAL BILL.

After a public hearing and a careful investigation into the law and the facts, the Railroad Commission of the State of California makes the following recommendations in the matter of the Panama Canal bill now pending before Congress:

"(1) We recommend that vessels owned, operated, or controlled by railroads and engaged in whole or in part in coastwise trade be barred from the Panama Canal, and suggest the advisability of extending this principle so as to make it unlawful for any railroad to own, operate, or control any common carrier by water with which such railroad does or may compete for traffic between points within the United States.

"Under the decision of the United States Supreme Court on the so-called commodities clause in the interstate commerce act, in the case of United States v. Delaware & Hudson Co. (213 U. S., 366), we believe there can be no doubt as to the legal right of the Government to compel a railroad to sell its holdings in a steamship line. We can find no valid reason in governmental policy against this recommendation. The inevitable result of permitting railroads to own, operate, or control competing steamship lines through the Panama Canal, as shown by the history of the coastwise traffic of this country, will be to crush out every independent line, to give to the railroads the control of the Panama Canal and consequently to keep freight rates higher than they normally would be. We would refer in this connection to the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission in the case of Railroad Commission of Nevada v. Southern Pacific Co. (21 I. C. R., 329), decided on June 22, 1911, in which case the history of steamship competition in this country is fully explained.

"(2) We recommend that American shipping engaged in coastwise trade through the canal be exempt from the payment of tolls.

"Under the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the case of Olsen v. Smith (195 U. S., 332) it is clear that the United States may carry out this recommendation. The provision in section 1 of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to the effect that "The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect to the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise"—whatever the full effect thereof may be—certainly does not apply to coastwise traffic for the reason that as American vessels may alone engage in such traffic there can be no question of discrimination as against the vessels of other nations. The Olsen case squarely sustains this position.

"The remission of tolls on vessels engaged in the coastwise trade will make it possible for them to lower to that extent the freight rates which they would otherwise have to charge, and in this way the American people will secure a reduction in freight rates to which they are clearly entitled as the result of the tremendous sums which they have expended in the construction of the canal.

We use the words "American people" advisedly. We do not concede that the lower freight rates between coast points brought about by water competition through the canal can in any wise injure interior localities. On the one hand, the free movement of traffic between coast points not only will operate for the benefit of these localities, but such benefit will be reflected far inland and the general prosperity of the country will necessarily result. On the other hand, lower freight rates to coast points will not operate disadvantageously to the interior by increasing rates to and from interior points. It is well established that railroads may not lower their rates to meet competition to such an extent as to burden other traffic. If rightly regulated, the railroads of the United States must give reasonable rates to all points, and reasonable rates are all that they can be forced to give. The fact that a less than reasonable rate is put in by railroad companies voluntarily to meet water competition does not justify such railroad in putting any different rate in effect elsewhere than it could legally put in if it did not meet such competition. The result, then, of free competition through the canal will be a lower rate to coast points than would otherwise prevail, which lower rate to the coast points will have its effect to that point in the interior where the local freight rate from the coast to such points plus the steamship rates equals the transcontinental rate from the opposite coast point. Much of the interior, therefore, will be better off than it now is and none of it can be worse off, because, as we have stated, the railroads must accord the same reasonable rate when they meet competition as they are allowed under the law to give when they do not meet such competition.

(3) We recommend that American shipping engaged in foreign trade and using the Panama Canal be likewise exempted from the payment of tolls or that subsidies equivalent in amount, at least, to those paid by other Governments to their ships using the canal be provided by the United States.

Otherwise, the United States, which built the canal at a tremendous outlay, will be the only nation whose vessels are sailing through the canal without Government assistance. We do not believe that there is anything in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to prevent such action on the part of the United States. The treaty provides that the rules of neutralization to govern the canal are to be substantially the same as those which govern the use of the Suez Canal. The vessels of Great Britain and other nations using the Suez Canal receive subsidies from their Governments, and no one has ever contended that the principle of equality in the use of the canal is thereby violated. In the same way the United States can clearly pay subsidies to her vessels using the Panama Canal, and what she can do directly by the payment of subsidies she certainly can do indirectly by the remission of tolls in the same amount.

We respectfully direct the attention of California's Representatives in Congress to these recommendations and urge that they do all in their power to secure their adoption in the Panama Canal bill.

RESOLUTION IN RE PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Resolved by the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce, That we reaffirm the statement of the principles and policy involved in the resolutions adopted by this chamber as a member of the Associated Chambers of Commerce of the Pacific Coast, October 2, 1911, as follows:

"Whereas the building of the Panama Canal was undertaken by the people of the United States in pursuance of a great national policy, amongst other things, of providing for the national defense, of opening up the shortest possible water route between the respective coasts of the United States and foreign countries, to provide through natural methods and to prevent monopoly of transportation and means for transportation between the various sections of the Union at the lowest possible cost, to build up and expand our commerce with foreign nations and incidentally to encourage the upbuilding of a now decadent merchant marine: Be it

"Resolved, That there should be no tolls charged through the Panama Canal to vessels coastwise flying the American flag; and be it further

"Resolved, That we heartily approve of the legislation recommended by President Taft in his message to Congress of December 6, 1910, reading as follows:

I believe such a provision may be needed to save to the people of the United States the benefit of the competition in trade between the eastern and western seaboards which this canal was constructed to secure.'

"Resolved, That the recent action of the majority of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House of Representatives in relation to Panama Canal tolls is at variance in all essential particulars with the foregoing statement of the principles and policy, which, in our opinion, should govern legislation on this subject, and we desire to emphasize the protest which this chamber has heretofore made to this proposed action of Congress by transmitting a copy of this resolution to every Member of the House of Representatives and to every United States Senator."

I hereby certify that the above is a true and correct copy of the resolutions adopted by the board of directors of the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce at the regular meeting held Wednesday, March 13, 1912.

Hon. JOSEPH R. KNOWLAND,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce reiterates its earnest and solemn protest to placing a tollgate at entrance to Panama Canal to collect tax in name of toll against American commerce and shipping engaged in coastwise trade, thus discriminating against people of Pacific coast by levying tax that is not exacted against vessels or craft engaged in similar coastwise commerce in Soo Canal, Erie Canal, and various rivers made navigable at Government expense in which Pacific coast bears its proportionate share. This chamber is also absolutely opposed to permitting ships owned or controlled wholly or in part by railway companies to engage in coastwise traffic through Panama Canal.

Hon. JOSEPH R. KNOWLAND, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: At a regular meeting of the board of directors of the San Jose (Cal.) Chamber of Commerce we unanimously passed the following resolution:

"Resolved, That this chamber of commerce is opposed to the operation through the Panama Canal of any railroad owned or controlled ship engaged wholly or partly in coastwise traffic; also that we strongly urge upon the Senators and House of Representatives the enactment of laws that will exempt from canal tolls all ships sailing under the American flag engaged in coastwise traffic."

Yours, very respectfully,

Secretary-Manager.

SEATTLE, WASH., March 13, 1912.

This bureau is unalterably opposed to the operation through the Panama Canal of any steamship line owned, operated, or controlled, directly or indirectly, by a railroad engaged in interstate commerce. We trust every effort will be used to prevent it. If not prevented, canal will be useless in controlling transcontinental rates, and will in no wise benefit interstate commerce between States bordering on United States littoral.

TRANSPORTATION BUREAU OF THE NEW SEATTLE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

The following resolution was unanimously adopted by the Northwestern Association of Box Manufacturers by a regular vote of the members at Portland, Oreg., on the 22d of March, 1912:

"Whereas the Government of the United States is constructing the Panama Canal, entirely at its own cost, for the benefit of its own people, as a military measure, and for the facilitation of its domestic commerce, as well as for the furtherance of the commerce of the world; and

"Whereas in so far as respects domestic commerce in the United States the Panama Canal is a part of the interrelated waterway system of the United States; and

"Whereas the United States, by act of Congress passed in 1884, made the following declaration of policy regarding tolls or charges relative to waterways acquired or constructed by the Federal Government: 'No tolls or operating charges shall be levied upon or collected from any vessel, dredge, or other water craft for passing through any lock, canal, canalized river, or other work for the use of and benefit of navigation now belonging to the United States, or that may be hereafter acquired or constructed'; and

"Whereas the extension of the general policy of freedom from tolls to the domestic coastwise commerce of the United States passing through the Panama Canal can not create a discrimination against any other nation or its citizens or subjects in respect to the conditions, or charges, or traffic, or otherwise, because of the fact that no such nation has been or now is permitted by law to engage in such coastwise commerce; and

"Whereas it is necessary in order to secure to the people of the United States the benefits of the competition between the eastern and western seaboards of the United States, through said canal, and on other waterways of the United States, that railroad owned or controlled steamship companies should not be permitted to use said canal, and that railroads should not be permitted to own, control, or operate competing lines of water carriers on the waters of the United States—

"Resolved, First. That there should be no tolls charged to vessels or on their cargoes engaged in domestic commerce between ports of the United States passing through the Panama Canal.

"Second. That a law be enacted making it unlawful for railroads to own, lease, operate, or control any competing steamship or other water lines on or through the Panama Canal or other waterways of the United States or between the ports thereof."

Resolutions of the Merchants' Association of New York, adopted May 7, 1912:

"Whereas the waterways of the country, including the Panama Canal when completed, are largely the creation of national expenditure, and are valuable in proportion as they are utilized for transportation; and

"Whereas the extent of their utilization is largely influenced by the charges imposed upon the traffic which avails of them, which charges should be regulated by the competitive conditions which should normally and fairly exist; and

"Whereas it is the declared policy and the duty of the Government to safeguard the independence of such competition, and laws enacted for that purpose have been construed by the Supreme Court of the United States to prohibit a consolidation under one control of different railroad lines competing for the same traffic; and

"Whereas it is evident that a consolidation of control of transportation over a water route and a land route which are parallel and competitive would imply an advantage which would not inhere in the control of either route independently, and that independent transportation by water would thus be placed at a disadvantage by such joint control, which would tend to destroy the benefit to the public which free competition would afford; and

"Whereas it has transpired in proceedings before the Interstate Commerce Commission in the Spokane and other rate cases that efforts are being made to minimize the natural advantages arising from location on the seaboard and from less expensive transportation by water, which efforts, if successful, would tend arbitrarily to divert both the distributive and manufacturing business from the seaboard; and

"Whereas the history of control by railroads of water lines competitive with such roads discloses a general tendency to eliminate independent competition by water, resulting in a subsequent increase in the rates charged for water transportation: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the Merchants' Association of New York approves the principle embodied in section 11 of the proposed act of Congress, known as H. R. 21969, which prohibits the ownership or control by a railroad line of facilities for transportation by a water route competing for the same traffic, and urges that it be enacted into law."

AMERICANS LIVING IN ENGLAND.

At a meeting of the London (England) Section of the Navy League of the United States, on Friday, March 29, 1912:

Moved by F. C. Van Duzer:

"Whereas the opening of the Panama Canal will unquestionably effect great changes in our coastwise trade, leading to an increasing demand for an efficient merchant marine;

"Whereas the new canal route will be open to ships of all nations, involving increased protective measures for the proper safeguarding of American interests, which must comprise a strong merchant marine as a necessary auxiliary to an efficient navy;

"Whereas the American merchant marine is at the present time decadent and the Navy League has repeatedly passed resolutions in favor of general measures having for their object the restoration of the American merchant marine: Be it therefore

"Resolved, That this meeting of members of the Navy League of the United States in London views with concern the present inefficiency of the American merchant marine to cope with the trade of its own country; that, with special regard to developments likely to occur in connection with the opening of the Panama Canal, it urges upon the Navy League at home to continue to use every effort within its power for the promotion of legislative measures calculated to raise the American merchant marine to a footing commensurate with the needs, present as well as future, of our coastwise trade (but, above all, to endure a naval auxiliary fleet), and by subsidies, remission of canal dues, or otherwise, as the high discretion of Congress may determine, to so encourage private enterprise in the shipping industry at home as to insure the service becoming a powerful auxiliary to our naval arm."

Seconded by Arthur G. Glasgow.

Carried unanimously.

Signed on behalf of the governing committee,

THOMAS L. FIELD, Chairman.
FRED M. FISK,
Honorable Secretary.

SALEM, OREG., March 13, 1912.

The effect of the ownership or control of competing water lines by rail lines in this country is too well known to require any extended explanation. This control and ownership has practically eliminated water competition and largely minimized water transportation. There are bills now pending in Congress containing provisions which forbid the ownership or control, directly or indirectly, of competing steamer or boat lines by rail lines. Some bills limit it only to use of steamers using the Panama Canal. We believe the law should be general in its scope. We respectfully solicit your support of the bills now pending advocating laws forbidding such ownership or control. We know of nothing that is more detrimental to the development of water transportation than is the ownership or control of competing water lines by rail lines.

RAILROAD COMMISSION OF OREGON.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The time of the gentleman from Georgia is to be charged to his colleague [Mr. ADAMSON].

The CHAIRMAN. So the Chair understands.

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Chairman, I desire at the outset to make a few general observations that will explain my attitude on the pending bill before entering upon a discussion of its merits.

The five members of the committee who signed the minority report parted company with their colleagues because of a firm conviction that to tax interstate commerce at the Panama Canal would be an unwarranted departure from a long-established policy and would deny to the American people the full and complete benefits to which an investment of $400,000,000 clearly entitles them. [Applause.]

To my mind this is the most important and far-reaching question that has come before Congress in a generation. The naked issue that confronts this House is whether the Panama Canal is to be run in the interest of the taxpayers and consumers of the United States or in the interest of the transcontinental railroads that have always opposed the canal and would now destroy its beneficial use to the American people. [Applause.]

In my judgment, Mr. Chairman, it would mean political suicide for any party or any individual who votes to make this great canal, built at such tremendous expense, less than a free and unfettered competitor of railroad transportation. [Applause.]

If we could have a referendum on this question of a free waterway to interstate commerce, absolutely divorced from railroad influences, nine-tenths of the American people would vote "Yes" and the railroads would vote "No."

The canal should not only be a free waterway for our domestic commerce, but no railroad-owned or railroad-controlled boat engaged in interstate commerce should be permitted to poke its nose into the locks. [Applause.]

I repudiate the specious plea that this great question should await a future solution. The time to play fair with the American people is now. Let us not do the wrong thing to-day and trust to a future Congress to right the wrong. [Applause.]

It is said that by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty we have bartered away to a foreign government our constitutional power over interstate commerce through the canal. On that proposition I refuse to run up the white flag of surrender. I deny that the control of our domestic affairs has been transferred from Washington to the Court of St. James. [Applause.]

If we are going to allow the English press to construe the Hay-Pauncefote treaty for us and permit the railroads to dominate the canal we might better have sunk our four hundred millions of dollars in the bottom of the sea.

I am opposed to allowing a coterie of Wall Street parasites to dictate the canal policy of Congress. [Applause.] The Pacific Mail Steamship Co. is owned and controlled by the Southern Pacific Railway. Mr. R. P. Schwerin, vice president and general manager of the Pacific Mail Steamship Co., went down to Wall Street recently for the purpose of securing a loan for the construction of four boats to be operated through the canal. He was informed that he could not have the loan if Congress was going to enact Panama Canal legislation hostile to the interests of the transcontinental railroads. (Panama Canal Hearings, vol. 4, pp. 1051–1070.)

Not only that, but Mr. Schwerin also stated before the committee that if his steamship company divorced itself from the Southern Pacific Railroad he would still be unable to obtain the loan. I call attention to the following testimony of Mr. Schwerin, found on page 1062 of the Panama Canal Hearings, volume 4:

Mr. HAMLIN. But if a railway owns ships and doesn't violate the provisions of this act, it does not hurt them any.

Mr. SCHWERIN. You won't get any money under this bill.

Mr. HAMILTON. If you were divorced from the Southern Pacific Railroad—your company—couldn't you raise money just as well?

Mr. SCHWERIN. No, sir; I couldn't get one dollar.

This testimony shows clearly that Wall Street will loan no money to a railroad-owned ship company if Congress discriminates against railroad-owned boats, and that if a ship company divorces itself from the railroad it can obtain no money, for in that event it might become an independent competitor of the railroads. In other words, Congress must admit the railroads into the Panama Canal upon equal terms with everybody else or no money will be forthcoming with which to build ships for traffic through the canal. Thus would these patriotic gentlemen throttle competition with the railroads and rob the American people of the legitimate fruits of their $400,000,000 investment. The issue, Mr. Chairman, is clearly drawn with the country on one side and these great financial interests on the other.

I hope this House will meet the issue squarely and serve notice upon the railroads and their Wall Street allies that they must keep their hands off the Panama Canal. [Applause.]

For the first time in American history it is proposed to erect a tollgate in the path of interstate trade. I believe that if this House does its duty it will apply the torch to section 5 of this bill and burn it up. Let the conflagration be so complete that a like proposal will never find its way to the floor of this House. [Applause.]

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will it bother the gentleman if I ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. DOREMUS. Yes.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Section 3 of the general bridge act provides that any company desiring to use a railroad bridge, built under the railroad-bridge act, shall pay for it, the same as is provided by the law under which the Panama Canal was built; that is, we authorize a railroad that builds a bridge to charge for the use of it in interstate commerce.

Mr. DOREMUS. Yes.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. So that this Congress does authorize charges, levies tolls, and imposes taxes in interstate commerce, does it not?

Mr. DOREMUS. Yes. The gentleman is entirely right. The mistake he makes is in confusing a proposition of that kind with the Panama Canal, which is a Government-owned proposition, and the tax proposed to be imposed is a Government-imposed tax. If they had proceeded under the old Clayton-Bulwer treaty and permitted an American company or private individuals to build the canal, of course everybody would have had to pay tolls for the use of the canal. But this is an entirely different proposition. The canal is not being built by a private corporation. The Government simply permits a private corporation to charge a reasonable toll for the use of the improvement.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Article 1 of the canal treaty provides as follows:

It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares—

So that the treaty provides for three different methods of construction.

Mr. DOREMUS. Yes.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The gentleman will admit that under the last two methods there might be tolls charged. The gentleman claims that under the first method there can not be tolls charged. What is in the treaty that provides for a different arrangement or rights or obligations as to one of those methods as distinguished from any other?

Mr. DOREMUS. I will say to the gentleman that at the time that treaty was entered into nobody in this country or anywhere else contemplated that anyone other than the United States would build that canal. All hope of a private corporation building it was abandoned years ago.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. But the treaty makes those three provisions. Will not the gentleman explain how that was?

Mr. DOREMUS. When I come to that I will do that, if my friend will permit me to proceed.

I trust that the Members of this House understand fully the real significance of section 5 of this bill. By that section it is deliberately proposed that an American vessel, flying the American flag, laden with American products, and bound from the port of one State to the port of another State, shall be stopped at a tollgate and compelled to pay a tax before it may proceed to its destination.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there? If that ship, bearing those goods from one port to another, does not pay the tolls, who will pay them?

Mr. DOREMUS. I would rather my friend from New York would wait a minute, because I will come to that if I am only given the time. I will show just how much money we expect to get out of the coastwise trade and out of the foreign trade. I will come to that in regular order.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. I hope the gentleman will discuss that.

Mr. DOREMUS. I will be glad to do that.

To state the proposition in another form, it is proposed to erect an artificial barrier in the path of free exchange between the States of the products of the American farm, forest, mine, and factory. It is unnecessary to say that this proposal is new and revolutionary. It is at war with the fundamental policy of this Government for 125 years—a policy which, coupled with a national system of internal improvements, has made the domestic commerce of the United States the marvel of the civilized world.

We have expended in the improvement of rivers and harbors and the construction of canals, exclusive of the Panama Canal, the sum of $627,098,236.05. (Report of the Secretary of the Treasury to the President of the Senate, Mar. 6, 1912. S. Doc. No. 382, 2d sess. 62d Cong.)

If we are now to abandon our historic policy of free commerce between the States, why not erect tollgates on the Mississippi River, in the improvement of which we have expended $123,088,909.05—or nearly one-third of the estimated cost of the Panama Canal? Why not burden our merchant marine at the harbors of Philadelphia, Baltimore, Boston, New York, Savannah, New Orleans, Galveston, and other places, in the improvement of which the Government has expended many millions of dollars? If this is to be our policy, why not erect a tollgate at the Soo Canal, through which 41,653,488 tons of shipping passed in 1911? We have expended upon the Great Lakes and waterways connected therewith, including the Soo Canal and locks, the sum of $110,015,381.04. The commerce that passed through the Soo Canal in 1911 exceeded the world's commerce through the Suez Canal in 1910 by 25,000,000 tons. This tonnage, nearly all of which was domestic traffic, also passed through the Detroit River, upon which the Government has expended nearly $10,000,000. Why not build a tollgate there?

The reasons which actuated the majority of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to recommend tolls upon our coastwise trade at the Panama Canal are found in the report that accompanied this bill. Therein we are informed that free tolls to our domestic merchant marine would be a "subsidy" to the shipowner, because it would take money from the American people and give it to a small special interest. This would be a strange doctrine, Mr. Chairman, to be embraced by this House, a majority of whose Members profess the faith of their Democratic fathers and proclaim their unfaltering devotion to our ancient institutions.

I hold in my hand a volume containing the laws enacted at the first session of the First Congress under the Constitution. This volume is gray and musty with age, but within its ancient covers are reflected, in my opinion, more wisdom on the subject of our merchant marine and the development of American commerce than is contained in all the propositions that have been advanced in Congress during the intervening years. The first act found in this volume is an act to regulate the time and manner of administering certain oaths—an unimportant measure. The second act, introduced by James Madison, approved July 4, 1789, is an act for levying duties on goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States.

This act aimed to raise revenue for the support of the Government, protect our infant industries, and encourage the upbuilding of our merchant marine. This latter purpose was accomplished by providing for a discount of 10 per cent of the tariff duties upon imports into this country in ships built and owned by American citizens. Not satisfied with this, Congress provided in the same act for special discrimination in favor of American vessels in the trade of the Far East. It provided that if tea was imported in American ships direct from India and China, it paid a duty of 6 cents a pound for Bohea, 10 cents for Souchong, 20 cents for Hyson, and 12 cents for all other green varieties. If, however, tea was imported in a foreign ship, it paid a duty of 15 cents for Bohea, 21 cents for Souchong, 45 cents for Hyson, and 27 cents for other varieties. The effect of this discrimination in favor of our own shipping will be understood when it is stated that on a cargo of 100,000 pounds of assorted teas, an American ship sailing from China or India would pay duties of $10,980, while a foreign ship would pay $27,800 for a like cargo.

The effect of this law upon American shipping was instantaneous. The report of the American Institute of the city of New York stated in 1828 that "so complete has been this security that your committee believes that there has not been a single pound of tea imported since the passage of the law in question which has not been imported in an American bottom." (Marvin's American Merchant Marine, p. 41):

> Between 1789 and 1828 Congress passed numerous laws intended to protect and encourage American shipbuilding. Under these wise and salutary measures our merchant marine grew rapidly. On December 31, 1789, our total shipping registered for the foreign trade was only 123,893 tons. It had increased to 346,254 tons in 1790 and to 576,733 tons in 1796. (Report of Commissioner of Navigation for 1900.)

I have carefully examined the debates in Congress that preceded the passage of the act of 1789, and have found no intimation or suggestion that a reduction of 10 per cent in duties on goods carried in American vessels would take money from the pockets of the people and give it to a special interest. The Members of that Congress knew that a tax collected at the customhouse would be borne by the consumer, and that a lower duty in favor of goods carried in American ships would relieve the consumer and at the same time encourage the upbuilding of our merchant marine. Give us more "subsidies" that leave money in the pockets of the people and at the same time develop American industries.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. DOREMUS. I yield.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Would this policy of removing the tolls help our American merchant marine in the least, except our local commerce, of which we now have a monopoly? If the gentleman is in favor of something for our merchant marine on the high seas, I am with him, and the Republican Party is with him on that proposition.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. DOREMUS. I yield to my friend from Missouri.

Mr. ALEXANDER. It may be interesting to note at this point that the Republican Party in 1896 declared in favor of discriminating duties in favor of American ships, although since that time every proposition presented to Congress by them has been in favor of a subsidy.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. That is not correct.

Mr. DOREMUS. I will say in that connection that this great arm of our merchant marine, known as our domestic merchant marine, exceeds that of any nation upon the face of the globe; and I know my friend from New York will take equal pride with me as he contemplates that splendid fact, and I propose if within my power to encourage it still further. But my time is passing and I will have to hasten on.

The third act passed by the First Congress, approved July 20, 1789, was an act imposing duties on tonnage. It provided that on all ships built within the United States and belonging wholly to a citizen or citizens thereof a tonnage duty of 6 cents per ton should be levied. It provided that all ships thereafter built in the United States, belonging wholly or in part to subjects of foreign powers, should pay a duty of 30 cents per ton, and that all other ships should pay duties at the rate of 50 cents per ton. It also provided that no ship built within the United States and belonging to a citizen or citizens thereof, should, while employed in our coasting trade, pay tonnage duties more than once in any year. At the present time no tonnage duties are imposed upon vessels engaged in our coastwise trade. This policy of encouraging our merchant marine culminated in 1817 in a law that prohibited foreign vessels from engaging in our coastwise trade. It was, however, the legislation of 1789 that laid the foundation of our long-continued policy of preserving our domestic trade to American vessels, and this policy, supported by our ablest statesmen in all parties, has given the United States the greatest domestic merchant marine on the globe. Under the stimulus of this early legislation, the tonnage of our coastwise shipping increased from 68,607 tons in 1789 to 245,295 tons in 1800. It reached the one million mark in 1838, and has continued its rapid growth up to the present time. In 1911 the tonnage of our coastwise trade reached the splendid volume of 6,720,313 tons.

In the Fifty-eighth Congress the Democratic minority, while opposing a direct subsidy from the Treasury to American ships, favored a return to the ancient system of discriminatory duties as best calculated to restore our merchant marine. I quote the following from the report of the minority members of the Merchant Marine Commission, presented in 1905:

A return to the discriminating duty policy appears to be generally favored, as shown by the hearings of the Merchant Marine Commission at the most important ports on the Atlantic, Pacific, and Gulf coasts, and on the Great Lakes. This was the policy of the fathers of the Republic, under which our shipping interests were so marvelously developed in our early history. Under this policy merchant ships flying the American flag were seen in every important port of the civilized world, and, under its fostering care, our ships carried more than three-fourths of our exports and imports. (Rept. 4136, pt. 2, 58th Cong., 3d sess.)

This was the voice of Democracy, speaking through its chosen Representatives, in the Fifty-eighth Congress. What will be its position now, when, for the first time in American history, it is proposed to hold up at a tollgate an American vessel engaged in interstate trade and exact from it the same tribute we demand from a foreign vessel flying a foreign flag?

My Republican friends, how are you going to vote on this proposition? This is not a partisan question. Two Republicans and three Democrats signed the minority report, advocating no tolls on American ships engaged in interstate commerce. Are you gentlemen, who in the past have advocated direct subsidies from the Treasury in order to encourage our merchant marine, going to vote against this preference to American shipping? I sincerely hope not.

We are told in the majority report that—we may rightfully appropriate from the Treasury for the benefit of all the people, but giving public funds to special interests would be an unauthorized diversion and in politics and morals amounts to a misappropriation of the people's money.

Against this declaration I am perfectly willing to place the historic policy of this country, acquiesced in for so many years by the great leaders of all parties, and leave the question to the sober and deliberate judgment of the Members of this House. The party now in control of this House nor any of its leaders, past or present, have ever taken the view advocated by the majority of the committee, that a discrimination in favor of American shipping was a "subsidy" drawn from the pockets of the people. There is no difference in principle between a discrimination by a remission of duties at a customhouse and remission of duties at a tollgate. Both tolls and tariff duties are burdens upon consumption, and when remitted operate to leave money in and not take it out of the pockets of the people.

In the majority report we find the following strange proposition:

Ninety per cent of the coastwise ships, busy all the time in interstate business, will never approach the canal at all. Less than 10 per cent of all these coastwise ships will use the canal. * * * Yet it is selfishly demanded that those few ships (for only a few will be needed) shall be given their tolls in the interest of interstate trade, while the 90 per cent rendering service just as valuable in interstate commerce would not participate in the contribution.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question right there?

Mr. DOREMUS. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. I find this on page 6 of the report:

Ninety per cent of the coastwise ships, busy all the time in interstate business, will never approach the canal at all. Less than 10 per cent of all these coastwise ships will use the canal, making longer journeys, charging correspondingly more freight and passenger rates, and making infinitely more money, yet it is selfishly demanded that those few ships (for only a few will be needed) shall be given their tolls in the interests of interstate trade, while the 90 per cent rendering service just as valuable in interstate commerce would not participate in the contribution.

Mr. DOREMUS. That is part of what I just read. Now, assuming, for the sake of argument, that the percentages given are correct, the answer is that the 90 per cent of our coasting trade referred to are already enjoying the same privilege that we now ask shall be conferred upon the remaining 10 per cent that will use the canal. In other words, it is the majority of the committee who would unjustly discriminate, for they would withhold from the 10 per cent the privilege that is now freely given to the 90 per cent.

There is another proposition in the majority report to which I wish to refer. That majority report, in my judgment, is one of the most extraordinary documents that ever emanated from a committee. We are told that when "we go to voting away the Government's money and credit to special interests they prefer some method more fair and equitable." I know my friend from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] did not have anything to do with writing that.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOREMUS. I will.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I would like to call attention to the fact that most of the 90 per cent about which the majority seem so solicitous is owned by railroads, and that the 10 per cent that will go through the canal it is proposed to divorce entirely from the railroads.

Mr. DOREMUS. If we can.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. I want to say, if the gentleman from Michigan will permit, that the majority are not solicitous about the 90 per cent of the shipping but the 90,000,000 people who must pay for running the canal if the ships do not pay anything toward it. We are solicitous for all the people against a few shipowners who want a donation.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If we are to judge by the report, you are solicitous for the 90 per cent of the shipping.

Mr. DOREMUS. It is indeed a novel proposition with which we are confronted in this bill. From the foundation of the Government we have pursued a consistent and undeviating policy of free trade between the States and of discrimination in favor of our own commerce. The minority of your committee are contending for a great fundamental principle. Political parties have divided upon questions of commercial policy in regard to foreign trade from the beginning, but never until the present hour has anyone had the temerity to suggest that we erect an artificial barrier in the way of the free exchange of commodities between our own people. The wheat and corn of the West, the cotton and tobacco of the South, the manufactures of the East, the iron and coal of our mountain ranges, and the lumber of all sections have penetrated the farthest confines of the Republic, and neither the commercial nor the taxing power of Congress has ever been employed to intercept or impede their progress. This policy, wisely ordained by the founders of the Government, has been one of the great contributing causes of our marvelous growth. It has developed all sections of our country and benefited all classes of industry. It has made possible the present civilization of the Pacific coast and rendered the Panama Canal a military necessity and a commercial desirability.

EFFECT OF TOLLS UPON FREIGHT RATES.

The majority of the committee want to compel American vessels in the coastwise trade to pay something for the use of the canal. They overlook the fundamental economic truth that, if this bill becomes a law, the tolls will not be paid by the shipowner but by the American people. Congress has not the power to compel vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States to contribute to the Public Treasury for the use of the canal. If tolls are levied they will be added to the freight and the people will pay the freight. Does anyone imagine that, if a steamship company is required to pay $5,000 or $10,000 in tolls upon a cargo of merchandise shipped from one American port to another American port, those tolls will not be impressed upon the freight rate and passed on to the consumer? A tax, Mr. Chairman, whatsoever its form or name, that restricts the free interchange of commodities is paid by the purchaser of the commodities. When did it come to pass that a tax of 75 cents upon a ton of coal levied at the customhouse is paid by the consumer of coal, and a tax of 75 cents levied upon a ton of coal at a tollgate is not paid by the consumer of coal? Who is the founder of this new school of political economy that teaches that a tax of 50 cents or $1 on 1,000 feet of lumber is a burden on the home builder if paid at the customhouse and not a burden on the home builder if paid at a tollgate? What Member of this House is willing to father the doctrine that a tax is a burden when called a tariff, but a blessing when called a toll?

With reference to interstate commerce, the American people have always been free traders. We have always had plenty of protection against foreign countries. Are we now going to supplement this system by protecting ourselves against each other? Are we going to protect the lumber of the Pacific coast against the lumber of the South? Are we going to protect the products of one State against the products of another State?

My firm conviction is that we had better pause long and consider seriously before we embark upon such a policy as this.

This question affects not only every ton of American freight that passes through the Panama Canal but every ton that is carried by the transcontinental railroads. Every burden placed upon interstate commerce through the canal impairs its usefulness as a competing route with transportation by rail. This is true not only as to freight rates between coast-to-coast points but as to rates from interior points to the coast, for the through rate from coast to coast controls to a large extent the rate from interior points to the coast.

Before the construction of railroads to the Pacific the manufactures and other products of the East reached San Francisco via Cape Horn. In order to take away from the water carriers the traffic from the eastern seaboard, the railroads found it necessary to make a rate that compared favorably with the rate via Cape Horn. This was a primary consideration that in those days fixed the rail rate from the eastern seaboard to the Pacific. The next water-transportation route was via the Isthmus of Panama. Traffic was shipped by steamboat from New York to Colon, carried across the Isthmus by rail to Panama, thence by steamboat to San Francisco.

Then came the route from East to West through the Straits of Magellan. By this time the steamboat was fast supplanting the sailing vessel, and the time consumed between New York and San Francisco via this route was from 60 to 90 days. To-day the route most frequently used is via the Tehuantepec Railroad, owned by the Mexican Government, and running across lower Mexico, a distance of 180 miles. It receives the freight from New York at Coatzacoalcos, transfers it across the country to Salina Cruz, from which point it is taken by steamer to San Francisco and other Pacific coast points. The water rate by these various routes has always been, according to the Interstate Commerce Commission, somewhat lower than the rail rate from New York to San Francisco; and the commission has found—and of that there can be no question—that this water transportation has limited the rate which would be obtained by rail carriers between New York and Pacific terminals. (Twenty-fifth Annual Report Interstate Commerce Commission, p. 28.)

Manufacturing in this country is no longer confined to States bordering on the Atlantic Ocean. Aided by the policy of free commercial intercourse between the States, manufacturing plants have sprung up all over the great Middle West. These plants turn out the same products and are seeking the same markets as those located in the eastern section of the country. In this connection I quote the following from the Twenty-fifth Annual Report of the Interstate Commerce Commission, on page 29:

> Suppose, for example, that a manufacturing plant located at Chicago produced the same article manufactured by a similar plant in New York City. In order that this article may reach San Francisco from Chicago by water, it must first be transported to New York, where it is taken by a steamship. The cost of carriage by this route is, therefore, greater from Chicago than from New York, and if the force of water competition were to be alone considered, the rate from Chicago to San Francisco ought to be higher than the rate from New York by the amount of the interior rail rate from Chicago to New York. The Chicago manufacturer, however, insists that his rate by rail to San Francisco should be lower than the rate by rail from New York, for the reason that the traffic when taken up at New York moves through Chicago and is hauled 1,000 miles farther, at a correspondingly additional expense. It is for the interest of the rail line which begins at Chicago to apply a lower rate from Chicago then is applied from New York, since if the traffic originates at Chicago that line obtains the entire freight money, while if the traffic originates at New York it must divide the transportation charges with its connections east of Chicago, which bring the traffic from the Atlantic seaboard.

The manufacturer of automobiles in Detroit must have a rail rate to the Pacific coast that will be fairly competitive with the water rate given the manufacturer of automobiles on the Atlantic seaboard. The furniture manufacturer of Grand Rapids must have a rail rate to the Pacific coast that will be fairly competitive with the water rate of eastern manufacturers of furniture. The bath-tub manufacturer at Chicago demands a rate by rail to the West that will enable him to compete with the bath-tub manufacturer at New York who uses the water route. These examples might be multiplied indefinitely. The manufacturers of Detroit, Grand Rapids, Chicago, St. Louis, and other cities must meet the market competition of their eastern rivals, and to enable them to do so the railroads must meet the competition of the water route. If this is not done, both manufacturers and railroads will lose the business.

The majority of the committee would have us believe that free tolls to our interstate commerce would affect only a small section of the country. We are told in their report that "only a small per cent of the American people will ship freight in considerable quantities through the canal." No man can predict with any degree of accuracy the volume of traffic that will pass through the Panama Canal. There are those of us who believe that we have not built this canal at an enormous cost in vain, but that this great enterprise will in the course of time revolutionize existing transportation conditions. Certainly the American people, who with common accord have been willing to bear the vast expense incurred in its construction, are entitled to all possible benefits therefrom.

In justice to the American people Congress should not, by the levying of tolls, discourage transportation through the canal and thus impair its usefulness as a competing route with transportation by rail. I have endeavored to show that the benefits of free tolls to our domestic commerce will not be confined to the two seaboards, but will extend to that immense section of our country east of the Rocky Mountains. The Panama Canal will operate as a natural regulator of rates throughout this entire section. This will be true for the reason that the railroads operating between intermediate points and the Pacific coast will not permit a lower rate from coast to coast points to take their business from them. As stated in the minority report—

> Free tolls can not but minimize rail freight rates on all the manufactures of the Atlantic seaboard and the Middle West, the products of the great Mississippi Valley, and those of the Pacific coast to the ultimate advantage of the producers and consumers throughout the entire country.

It is predicted by those whose familiarity with the transportation problem entitles their opinion to great weight, that if the canal is made a free competitor of the transcontinental railroads complaints before the Interstate Commerce Commission under the long and short haul clause will ultimately cease. Surely, Mr. Chairman, this consummation would be of infinitely more benefit to the people than the proposed scheme of taxation, which, in the form of tolls, would exact from the consumer a contribution for the support of the canal.

I trust the argument that free tolls would subsidize a comparatively small part of our merchant marine will not obscure the overshadowing question of whether this canal shall be operated for the benefit of all the people, or favor the great transcontinental railroads that opposed the canal from the beginning and would control it now if they could. With the utmost respect for those who differ with me on this question, their horror of a subsidy reminds me of the old lady who with her eyes intently fixed upon the flyspecks on the ceiling was unable to see the accumulation of dirt upon the floor.

Assuming that freight rates through the canal will be fixed by competitive conditions, a toll of $10,000 upon a cargo of merchandise en route from New York to San Francisco will increase by $10,000 the amount the transcontinental railroads may charge for a similar service. I do not think this proposition can be successfully assailed. It will also increase the rates the rail carriers may charge from the interior, for, as heretofore pointed out, the through rate controls the rate from intermediate points. This being so, it becomes a question of whether Congress is willing to tax interstate shipping at the canal in order to get a comparatively small amount of revenue while enabling the railroads to collect from the American people many times that amount in freight rates. I recognize nothing that would justify Congress in enacting a law that would favor the railroads at the expense of the American people.

Now, in reply to the question asked by my colleague from New York [Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL], I will say that section 5 of this bill provides that the tolls to be levied shall not exceed $1.25 per net registered ton nor be less than the estimated proportionate cost of the actual maintenance and operation of the canal. The unwise and un-American feature of this section is that any attempt to lower the tolls on coastwise vessels to meet the actual cost of operation and maintenance would have to be followed by an equal reduction of tolls levied upon foreign vessels. That a much lower toll than $1.25 would pay the cost of maintenance and operation is clearly shown by the testimony of Dr. Emory R. Johnson, the Government's special commissioner on Panama Canal traffic and tolls. Dr. Johnson estimates that 10,500,000 tons of shipping will pass through the canal during the first year of its operation. Of this total only 1,160,000 tons will be interstate traffic. (See statement of Dr. Johnson, committee hearings, p. 705.) According to this estimate the remission of tolls to our interstate commerce would result in a revenue loss to the Government, on the basis of $1 per net registered ton, of only $1,160,000, leaving a gross revenue of $9,340,000. The conservative estimates of Col. Goethals show that it will cost to operate and maintain the canal, including sanitation and civil government, the sum of $4,000,000. It will thus be seen that the surplus for the first year on the basis of these estimates will be $5,340,000. This, of course, does not take into account the interest on the bonds. Indeed, if we attempted to levy a toll sufficiently large to pay this fixed charge and the cost of maintaining the military establishment on the zone, it would amount to a prohibition against the use of the canal by the commerce of the world. This canal is a military necessity. It will unify our naval fleet and practically double its efficiency. In view of this fact, if the canal is to be charged with the expense of military protection, it should also be credited with the vast sum that will be saved in the cost of battleships. I agree thoroughly with Col. Goethals that the cost of its construction should be written off the books as a charge against the national defense. The surplus earnings could then be converted into a sinking fund for the purpose of retiring the debt at maturity, and whatever additional sum is found necessary should be paid by the American people through the usual and constitutional methods of taxation.

I desire now to discuss the claim that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty prevents the United States from favoring American vessels engaged in interstate commerce. The preamble of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty recites that it is—desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th of April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention.

For a proper understanding of what was meant by the words "general principle" of neutralization mentioned in the preamble of the treaty, it will be necessary to refer briefly to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and the circumstances that surrounded its ratification. The discovery of gold in California emphasized the desirability of constructing a transisthmian canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. The route most generally considered at that time was via San Juan River and Lake Nicaragua. In 1849 a treaty was entered into by the United States and Nicaragua whereby the Government of the latter conceded to an American company the right to build a canal from San Juan, on the Caribbean Sea, through the San Juan River and Lake Nicaragua to the Pacific. Two obstacles, however, stood in the way of this company's successful prosecution of the undertaking. One was the British pretensions in Nicaragua, and particularly to the so-called Mosquito coast, over which Great Britain claimed to exercise a protectorate, and the other was the lack of the necessary capital in this country.

It would serve no useful purpose to dwell upon the claims and counterclaims with reference to British pretensions in Nicaragua, Costa Rica, and the Mosquito Coast. It will suffice to say that they were deemed by this Government of such importance that in 1849 Mr. Clayton, Secretary of State, entered into negotiations with the British Government that resulted in the ratification of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty in 1850. By this treaty the two Governments engaged to cooperate in guaranteeing the neutrality of a ship canal, to be open to the world and common to all nations. This convention contemplated that the canal should be built by a private corporation, and declared that neither the Governments of Great Britain nor the United States would ever obtain or maintain any exclusive control over the canal; that neither would erect or maintain any fortifications commanding the same or occupy, fortify, or colonize, or assume or exercise any dominion over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, and the Mosquito Coast, or any part of Central America. By this treaty the two Governments assumed a joint protectorate over the canal and the private corporation which, it was expected, would undertake the work. By article 7 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty they determined that they would give their support and encouragement to such persons or company as might first offer to commence the canal with the necessary capital and the consent of the local authorities. This undoubtedly had reference to the American company which had already obtained its concession from the Government of Nicaragua. At this time, however, two other routes had been suggested—one through the Mexican Province of Tehuantepec and the other through the Isthmus of Panama. For this reason alone another article was added to the treaty. This was article 8, the "general principle" of which, under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, it is our duty not to impair. This article reads as follows:

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain having not only desired in entering into this convention to accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a general principle, they hereby agree to extend their protection by treaty stipulations to any other practicable communications, whether by canal or railway, across the isthmus which connects North and South America, and especially to the interoceanic communications, should the same prove to be practicable, whether by canal or railway, which are now proposed to be established by the way of Tehuantepec or Panama. In granting, however, their joint protection to any such canals or railways as are by this article specified, it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other state which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford.

For the purpose of this controversy it would avail nothing to follow this celebrated treaty on its troublous journey from 1850 to 1902, when it was abrogated and superseded by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. To-day not a vestige of the conditions that surrounded the making of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty remains. All hope of constructing the canal by private individuals or corporations was long ago abandoned. Great Britain claims no protectorate, sovereignty, or dominion of any kind over the Isthmus of Panama. The canal is being built on territory that belongs to the United States in perpetuity, by virtue of a treaty with the Republic of Panama. No questions exist involving the integrity of the Monroe doctrine.

By the Hay-Pauncefote treaty Great Britain has voluntarily withdrawn her protection of the canal to which she obligated herself in the former treaty. The Panama Canal is a distinctly American enterprise, and the United States is its sole owner, builder, and protector. What, then, is the "general principle" of neutralization established by article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty mentioned in the preamble of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty?

Strictly speaking, the term "neutralization," when applied to a canal, refers to a condition under which the canal would be closed to the ships of war of belligerents. The term, however, has come to be used in a broader sense than this, so as to include an arrangement whereby protection is sought to be guaranteed against hostile attack or hostile interruption, while the same freedom of use is sought to be assured in war as in peace. No doubt, however, the leading motive of agreements of neutralization is to secure exemption from hostile attack and a corresponding prohibition of distinctive hostile use. When by article 9 of the treaty of Vienna provision was made for the "neutrality of the Free Town of Krakow and its territory," it was declared in the same breath: "No armed force shall be introduced upon any pretense whatever." When by article 11 of the treaty of Paris the Black Sea was "neutralized," the maintenance of armaments upon it was forbidden. In the neutralization of Luxemburg it was stipulated that the city of Luxemburg should no longer be treated as a federal fortress. By a treaty between Austria, France, Great Britain, Prussia, and Russia, signed at London November 14, 1863, the Ionian Isles were united to Greece and were neutralized.

Article 3 of the treaty declares that—as a necessary consequence of the neutrality to be thus enjoyed by the United States of the Ionian Islands, the fortifications constructed in the Island of Corfu and in its immediate dependencies, having no longer any object, shall be demolished.

The treaties of March 30, 1856, November 2, 1865, and March 13, 1871, having effected the neutralization of the Lower Danube and of the works constructed in aid of its navigation, the treaty of Berlin of July 13, 1878, provided that—all the fortresses and fortifications existing on the course of the river from the Iron Gates to its mouths should be razed and no new ones erected.

The Argentine Republic and Chile, by their treaty of July 23, 1881, declare:

The Straits of Magellan are neutralized forever, and their free navigation is guaranteed to the flags of all nations. To insure this neutrality and freedom, it is agreed that no fortifications or military defenses which might interfere therewith shall be erected. (Moore's International Law Digest, vol. 3, p. 267.)

Referring to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, we find that by article 5 the contracting parties engaged to "protect it from interruption, seizure, or unjust confiscation" and to "guarantee the neutrality thereof so that the said canal may forever be open and free and the capital invested therein secure." It was, however, expressly understood that the guarantee of protection and security was given conditionally and might be withdrawn by both Governments or either Government if both or either of them should consider that the persons or company undertaking or managing the canal had established regulations concerning traffic contrary to the spirit and intention of the convention, either by making unfair discriminations or by imposing oppressive exactions or unreasonable tolls.

Construing articles 5 and 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty together we can not escape the conclusion that the United States and Great Britain engaged to protect and guarantee the neutrality of the canal whichever route was finally selected, reserving to themselves, however, the right to withdraw that protection and guaranty if the private corporation operating the canal should discriminate against either. They also engaged that the canal should be open on equal terms to the citizens and subjects of every other nation which was willing to unite with the United States and Great Britain in their joint protection of the canal.

As heretofore observed, under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty there is no joint protectorate over the canal. Neither Great Britain nor any other nation is obligated to cooperate with the United States in protecting the canal nor is the right of the citizens and subjects of any other nation to the equal use of the canal conditioned upon any agreement by that nation to cooperate for its protection. By article 3 of the present treaty, the canal is to be free and open without discrimination to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing the rules which the United States has adopted as the basis for the neutralization of the canal.

The original draft of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, as transmitted to the Senate by President McKinley, contained the following:

ART. 3. The high contracting parties will, immediately upon the exchange of the ratifications of this convention, bring it to the notice of the other powers and invite them to adhere to it.

The article above quoted was stricken out in the Senate. The attitude of Great Britain with reference to this action is reflected in the subsequent negotiations as to amendments by the memorandum of Lord Lansdowne of August 3, 1901, wherein he said:

The omission of the article inviting the adherence of other powers placed this country in a position of marked disadvantage compared with other powers. While the United States would have a treaty right to interfere with the canal in time of war or apprehended war, and while other powers could with a clear conscience disregard any of the restrictions imposed by the convention of 1900, Great Britain alone would be absolutely precluded from resorting to any such action or from taking measures to secure her interest in and near the canal.

In the same communication Lord Lansdowne said:

While indifferent as to the form in which the point is met, I must emphatically renew the objections of His Majesty's Government to being bound by stringent rules of neutral conduct not equally binding upon other powers. I would, therefore, suggest the insertion in rule 1, after "all nations," of the words "which shall agree to observe these rules." This addition will impose upon other powers the same self-denying ordinance as Great Britain is desired to accept and will furnish an additional security for the neutrality of the canal, which it will be the duty of the United States to maintain.

The attitude of the United States toward the last suggestion is shown in the communication of Lord Lansdowne to Mr. Lowther of September 12, 1901, in which he said:

With regard to the changes suggested by His Majesty's Government, Mr. Hay was apprehensive that the first amendment proposed to clause 1 of article 3 would meet with opposition because of the strong objection entertained to inviting other powers to become contract parties to a treaty affecting the canal. If His Majesty's Government found it not convenient to accept the draft as it stood, they might perhaps consider favorably the substitution for the words "the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations which shall agree to observe these rules" the words "the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules," and instead of "any nation so agreeing" the words "any such nation." This, it seemed to Mr. Hay, would accomplish the purpose aimed at by His Majesty's Government.

Writing to Lord Pauncefote on October 23, 1901, Lord Lansdowne said:

Mr. Hay has suggested that in Article 3, Rule 1, we should substitute for the words "the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations which shall agree to observe these rules," etc., the words "the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules," and in the same clause as a consequential amendment, to substitute for the words "any nation so agreeing" the words "any such nation." His Majesty's Government were prepared to accept this amendment, which seemed to us equally efficacious for the purpose which we had in view, namely, that of insuring that Great Britain should not be placed in a less advantageous position than other powers, while they stopped short of conferring upon other nations a contractual right to the use of the canal.

I desire now to call the attention of the House to another significant feature of the negotiations that preceded the formal acceptance and ratification of the treaty. Article 2 of the original draft of the treaty, as transmitted to the Senate, reads as follows:

The high contracting parties, desiring to preserve and maintain the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer convention, which convention is hereby superseded, adopt, as the basis of such neutralization, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention between Great Britain and certain other powers, signed at Constantinople, October 29, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Maritime Canal; that is to say.

In the final draft the words "the high contracting parties" were stricken out, and the words "the United States" inserted. Referring to this change Lord Lansdowne, in his memorandum to Mr. Lowther, of August 3, 1901, says:

In form the new draft differs from the convention of 1900, under which the high contracting parties, after agreeing that the canal might be constructed by the United States, undertook to adopt certain rules as the basis upon which the canal was to be neutralized. In the new draft the United States intimate their readiness "to adopt" somewhat similar rules as the basis of the neutralization of the canal. It would appear to follow that the whole responsibility for upholding these rules, and thereby maintaining the neutrality of the canal, would henceforward be assumed by the Government of the United States. The change of form is an important one; but in view of the fact that the whole cost of the construction of the canal is to be borne by that Government, which is also to be charged with such measures as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder, His Majesty's Government are not likely to object to it.

These negotiations seem to demonstrate clearly that Great Britain, recognizing the United States as the sovereign owner and sole protector of the canal, and fully conceding our exclusive right to provide for its regulation and management, was contending only for equal treatment with other powers observing the rules adopted by the United States as the basis for the neutralization of the canal; and this, Mr. Chairman, in my opinion, based upon the investigation I have made of the question, is all there is to the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and which the United States agreed should not be impaired. Not by the wildest flight of the imagination can it be conceived that this "general principle" would be impaired by any preference the United States might see fit to give American vessels engaged in interstate commerce. Would anybody seriously contend that under this treaty Great Britain would not have the right to subsidize her own vessels using the canal or repay the tolls charged them for such use? On the contrary, would it not be the height of impertinence for this Government to attempt to dictate to Great Britain or any other nation the treatment they should accord their own shipping? The treatment that other nations may see fit to give their own vessels is none of our affair; and, for a better reason, it is no concern of any other nation what preference we give to our own vessels using a canal built, owned, and controlled by ourselves alone. We discharge our obligation to the world when we exact equal tolls and accord equal treatment to all nations, their citizens, and subjects that observe the rules the United States has laid down for the neutralization of the canal.

That portion of article 3 of the present treaty which it is claimed would be violated by passing our interstate commerce through the canal without the payment of tolls reads as follows:

The United States adopts as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th of October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal; that is to say:

"1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable."

The language of the subdivision just quoted shows plainly that the purpose was to prevent discrimination against any nation. Since 1817 no foreign vessel has been permitted to engage in our coastwise trade. This being so, any exemption Congress sees fit to make in favor of American vessels engaged in that trade would not and, in the very nature of things, could not be a discrimination against any nation, its citizens or subjects. In other words, no treatment that we may accord our own vessels could affect in any way, either for better or for worse, any foreign nation.

The United States having adopted as the basis of the neutralization of the Panama Canal the rules embodied in the convention of Constantinople for the free navigation of the Suez Canal, it may be proper to consider for a moment the construction that the powers signatory to that convention have placed upon it. It should be understood that the Suez Canal was built by a private corporation through territory over which the Ottoman Empire exercised the attributes of sovereignty. While a portion of its stock is at present owned by the British Government through purchase from the Khedive of Egypt, the canal is operated by a private company. It has been the practice of some of the powers that signed the treaty of Constantinople to favor by subsidy or otherwise their own vessels using the Suez Canal. According to the report of the Commissioner of Navigation for 1911, the Russian Government in 1908 appropriated the sum of $334,750 for the purpose of repaying the tolls exacted of Russian vessels passing through the canal to and from Russian ports. The right of Russia to do this under the treaty of Constantinople has passed unquestioned, yet we are confronted at the threshold of this controversy with the strange proposition that the United States, having adopted the rules of the convention of Constantinople, are prevented from doing the same thing that other nations under that convention have done. The construction that the powers signatory to the treaty of Constantinople have given that instrument clearly supports our right under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to favor our own shipping; and if we have the right to collect the tolls at the canal and repay them, we certainly have the right to remit them in the first instance. As stated in the minority report:

It is unnecessary to resort to a device or subterfuge in order to do indirectly what we have a right to do directly.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOREMUS. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Let me suggest that Russia and Austria-Hungary do pay the tolls of their ships going through the Suez Canal.

Mr. DOREMUS. That has been done for years, and I thank my friend from Missouri for calling my attention to it.

Mr. CULLOP. I did not quite understand the question of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER].

Mr. ALEXANDER. I said that Russia and Austria-Hungary paid the tolls for their ships going through the Suez Canal.

Mr. CULLOP. Yes; but there is a difference between the Suez Canal and the Panama Canal. The Suez Canal is owned by a private corporation and the Panama Canal is owned by the Government.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The gentleman is mistaken. The stock in the Suez Canal is owned by the British Government.

Mr. CULLOP. It is owned by people living under the British Government.

Mr. DOREMUS. The bill now under consideration expressly reserves the right of the United States to pass its own ships of war through the canal without the payment of tolls, notwithstanding the fact that the treaty provides—the canal shall be free and open to vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality.

The minority of your committee confess their inability to see the consistency of the position assumed by the majority of the committee that free tolls to our ships of commerce would violate the treaty, but that free tolls to our ships of war would not violate the treaty. In attempting to justify the right of the United States to exempt our war vessels from the payment of tolls, while denying our right to exempt our vessels of commerce, the majority of the committee take refuge behind article 2 of the treaty which gives the Government of the United States—all the rights incident to such construction as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

Let us examine this for a moment. The full text of article 2 reads as follows:

It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States either directly at its own cost or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscriptions to or purchase of stocks or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

It will be observed that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, this Government has the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal; and one of the provisions of the present treaty is that the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality. If this language is to be so construed as to prevent us from preferring our ships of commerce, it must also apply with equal force to our ships of war. In other words, under any fair construction of the treaty we can not exclude from its provisions vessels of war and include vessels of commerce. Either we have the power to exempt both from the payment of tolls or the power to exempt neither.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. How much more time does the gentleman want?

Mr. DOREMUS. About 10 minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will yield to the gentleman 10 minutes more.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire whether it is the intention of the chairman to have the committee rise when the gentleman from Michigan has concluded?

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, we have been unable to find any gentlemen who wish to go on and speak this evening, and therefore it will not be necessary to ask for an evening session.

Mr. MANN. What time does the gentleman want the House to meet to-morrow?

Mr. ADAMSON. We have already agreed to meet at 11 o'clock.

Mr. MANN. I know that, but I did not know but what the gentleman might want to meet earlier; say, at 10.

Mr. ADAMSON. I think that would be a little early, but I am willing.

Mr. DOREMUS. The contention that an exemption in favor of our coastwise trade would violate the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is due to a misconception of the purpose of the treaty. It will be pointed out in this debate that many of our treaties relating to commerce and navigation expressly reserve our coastwise trade from their operation; and this will be made the basis for an assumption that the absence of this reservation in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty shows an intention on the part of the high contracting parties not to exempt our coastwise trade. The majority report that accompanies this bill calls attention to the fact that when an amendment to the treaty was offered in the Senate expressly reserving to the United States the right to discriminate in favor of vessels of its citizens, it was rejected by a vote of 43 to 27. There is, of course, no record showing the reasons that led the Senate to reject the proposed amendment. The majority did not point out the fact that the Senate also rejected several amendments permitting the United States to fortify the canal, yet the canal is being fortified and the Government of Great Britain recognizes our right to fortify under the treaty.

Mr. ADAMSON. The answer to that is that in the new copy of the treaty Great Britain yielded to the military police and fortification propositions, but never did yield on the other.

Mr. DOREMUS. That is my friend's statement, and I shall pass on.

In the absence of any record to the contrary, it is fair to assume that both proposed amendments were rejected because the Senate believed the United States possessed the power to fortify the canal and exempt American commerce without expressly reserving that power in the treaty.

There is an inherent distinction in nature and purpose between a treaty of commerce and navigation and the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Treaties of the first-mentioned type are made for the purpose of securing reciprocal liberty of commerce and navigation between the contracting parties. The Hay-Pauncefote treaty was entered into for the purpose of facilitating the construction of a ship canal connecting the two oceans. Our treaties of commerce and navigation are reciprocal in character. The Hay-Pauncefote treaty, to all intents and purposes, is largely unilateral. In other words, we get nothing from other countries in return for opening up this great canal to the commerce of the world. The only condition we exact is that all nations, their citizens and subjects, shall observe the rules which we have adopted as the basis for the neutralization of the canal. By our treaties of commerce and navigation we obtain the right to enter the ports, places, and rivers of foreign countries and in return grant their citizens and subjects the same privilege in our own ports, places, and rivers. Our present agreement with Canada, regarding the use of the Soo and Welland Canals, is a reciprocal agreement. By it we permit the free use of the Soo Canal by Canadian vessels and receive our quid pro quo in the free use of the Welland Canal by American vessels. In every treaty of commerce and navigation in which we reserve the coastwise trade from its operation the reservation is merely declaratory of the law of 1817, excluding foreign vessels from that trade.

Our treaty of commerce and navigation with Great Britain contains no reservation of our coastwise trade for the reason that it was entered into before the navigation act of 1817 was passed. In that treaty it was provided that—no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States.

The Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Olsen v. Smith (195 U. S., 332) held that this treaty was not violated by either a State or Federal statute that exempted the coastwise trade of the United States from the payment of pilotage charges on the ground that such an exemption did not operate to produce a discrimination against British vessels. The fact that in that case the court was construing a statute of the State of Texas does not lessen its value as an authority. An act regulating pilotage and fixing pilotage charges with reference to vessels engaged in trade between the States is an exercise of the power to regulate commerce, a power which, however, the Supreme Court has held, may be exercised by the State until Congress has acted. I think it will be conceded that the Legislature of the State of Texas would have no more power to enact a law that violated a treaty with Great Britain than would the Congress of the United States. From the investigation I have been able to give this question, I am satisfied there is nothing in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty that tends to impair in any way the power the people have conferred upon Congress to regulate commerce by favoring American vessels engaged in interstate trade.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. DOREMUS. Certainly.

Mr. LEVY. Do I understand the gentleman to say that he is in favor of excluding ships that are owned or partly owned by American railroad companies from the Panama Canal?

Mr. DOREMUS. I am in favor of excluding from the Panama Canal every railroad-owned or railroad-controlled boat that is engaged in interstate commerce. I think the presence of a railroad-owned or railroad-controlled boat in the Panama Canal is a menace to the free and open competition to which the American people are entitled. [Applause.]

Mr. LEVY. Is it not true, then, that very few steamships flying the American flag will go through the Panama Canal?

Mr. DOREMUS. I do not think so.

Mr. LEVY. Oh, the gentleman does not think so!

Mr. DOREMUS. I will answer the gentleman. I do not believe the American people are investing $400,000,000 in this proposition in vain. I think, of course, that no man can predict with any degree of certainty either the character or the volume of traffic that may pass through that canal.

Mr. LEVY. Then you would exclude the American flag from going through the canal?

Mr. DOREMUS. I will say in answer to that question that while I want to develop the American merchant marine, I do not want a merchant marine controlled and dominated by the transcontinental railroads of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. LEVY. We are very poor in shipping, and does not the gentleman think that we ought to encourage those persons who supply the money for steamships? We have no steamship lines at all at the present time.

Mr. DOREMUS. I will say in answer to that that we had better try and get along for a little while without the assistance of the railroads and their Wall Street allies, and if we find, then, that we can not get along without them, it will be time to change that policy. [Applause.]

Mr. LEVY. Then the gentleman means to say that the only line that can go through there is a Canadian steamship line?

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Chairman, I can not yield any longer.

Mr. LEVY. I think the gentleman ought to yield, inasmuch as he has made the statement that he has made.

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Chairman, I can not yield further.

Mr. Chairman, we stand to-day upon the threshold of the opening of this great canal, the most stupendous enterprise of this or any other age. About to realize the dream of years, the heart of every American thrills with pride as he contemplates the successful prosecution of this great work under the American flag. In dedicating it to the perpetual use of all mankind let us preserve inviolate the great principle of free commerce between the States and thus guarantee to the American people the full and complete benefits to which they are honestly entitled. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman from Michigan a question.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, he has yielded the floor.

Mr. HILL. I do not care whether I ask the chairman of the committee the question or the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. ADAMSON. I have yielded the floor, but, Mr. Chairman, I will be very glad to inform my friend if there is anything in the world that I know that he does not know.

Mr. HILL. I do not know about this question, and I do not know how I am going to vote. I would like to ask the gentleman this question for information. Under the provisions of this bill a railroad-owned steamship, owned by the Grand Trunk or by any of the Canadian lines, could start from Halifax and run to Victoria through the canal, while an American railroad-owned steamship could not start from Boston and go to San Francisco?

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, there is not a man in the world, except JIM MANN, who knows everything at once, though some may know many things. We are not attempting in a canal bill to solve all of the commercial questions that may affect this country and the world. My construction and the only rational construction of this treaty is that at the canal we can not solve any of these questions, that we have to treat everybody and every ship and every man alike that comes through that canal. The question the gentleman asks relates to a question of commerce, not touching the canal, and in a proper place I am willing to deal with all such questions.

Mr. HILL. Does not this bill deal with them?

Mr. ADAMSON. This bill contains a provision in section 11 which disposes of the question as to interstate-commerce railroads using ships in coastwise trade, which includes, of course, the use of the canal.

Mr. HILL. But does it not give to a Canadian steamship line owned by a railroad privileges that it does not give to an American steamship line owned by a railroad?

Mr. ADAMSON. It does not give any privileges to anybody. It prohibits some people whom we have control over from doing things.

Mr. HILL. But allows other people over whom we do not have control to do those same things.

Mr. ADAMSON. If there is any way of reaching the other trouble, if there is any other trouble, that can be done by a proper amendment to the commerce laws, if it can be reached at all. We can not do everything in a canal bill. Gentlemen are mistaken if they thought that I arose to make another speech.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, may I have two minutes to ask the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS], who has evidently given a good deal of time and thought to this subject, a question?

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman says he has quit. He wound up with his peroration. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LLOYD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 21969, the Panama Canal bill, and had directed him to report that they had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. PORTER, for one week, on account of illness in his family.

To Mr. FRANCIS, for one week, on account of death in family.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. KNOWLAND, Mr. DOREMUS, and myself, who have spoken, have leave to extend our remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

J. KENNARD & SONS CARPET CO.

Mr. STONE. From the Committee on Finance I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 4007) for the relief of the J. Kennard & Sons Carpet Co., and I submit a report (No. 759) thereon. This is a unanimous report recommending its passage. It is to refund some penalties imposed on importations of linoleum. Would there be objection on the part of any Senator to having the bill read and taken up now?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to refund to the J. Kennard & Sons Carpet Co., of St. Louis, Mo., a corporation of the State of Missouri, the sum of $2,427.88, the same being the amount of penalties heretofore assessed against and collected from said company on account of customs duties in the months of April, May, July, and August, 1907.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not rise to object, but in the absence of any report I suggest that the Senator introduce the letters from the department.

Mr. STONE. I have made a report, with the letters.

Mr. HEYBURN. I did not suppose it was possible for the Senator to have prepared a report so quickly.

Mr. STONE. The report consists mainly of the letters that were read before the committee this morning.

Mr. HEYBURN. They ought to go in the RECORD in connection with the bill.

Mr. STONE. I ask to have the report inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the report will be inserted in the RECORD following the consideration of the bill. The Chair hears no objection to the present consideration of the bill.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The report this day submitted by Mr. STONE is as follows:

This bill is for the relief of J. Kennard & Sons Carpet Co., of St. Louis, Mo., to refund to the said company $2,427.88, the amount of the penalty assessed and collected from the same company on account of customs duties during the months of April, May, July, and August, of 1907. This company is a thoroughly responsible and in every way highly reputable establishment of long standing in St. Louis. The facts of this case are fully stated in the subjoined letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. MacVeagh, to the chairman of the Finance Committee, in which he inclosed copy of letter he had written relative to the same matter to the chairman of the Committee on Claims of the House of Representatives.

The Finance Committee by unanimous vote recommends that the bill pass.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

Washington, March 5, 1912.

The CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON FINANCE,

NOVEMBER 25, 1910.

The CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE ON CLAIMS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your reference of the 14th ultimo of H. R. 27153, a bill for the relief of the J. Kennard & Sons Carpet Co., of St. Louis, Mo., to refund to the said company $2,427.88, the amount of a penalty assessed and collected from the same company on account of customs duties during the months of April, May, July, and August of 1907.

The facts, as they appear from the records on file in this department, are as follows:

Between the dates of March 23 and August 9, 1907, J. Kennard & Sons Carpet Co. entered at the port of St. Louis nine different shipments of linoleum imported from England. The invoices on which entries were made showed the price at which the merchandise was purchased with various discounts and a freight allowance of 40s. per ton, which was deducted from the values of the merchandise as stated in the invoice.

On some of the entries the importers deducted the entire freight allowance from the invoice value, while on other entries one-half of the freight allowance was deducted.

Upon appraisement by the local appraiser the freight allowance deducted by the importers was added back to make market value, and upon reappraisement by a single general appraiser and by a board of three general appraisers the entire amount deducted as a freight allowance was added to make market value, together with an addition of 2s. per bale for packing charges. Pursuant to the requirements of section 13 of the act of June 10, 1890, the surveyor liquidated the entries upon the values returned by the Board of General Appraisers and assessed an additional duty of 1 per cent for each 1 per cent that the appraised value exceeded the entered value, as required by section 32 of the act of July 24, 1897, the total amount of such additional duties being $2,427.88.

The importers applied to the department for a remission of the additional duties so assessed, but as it appeared that the undervaluation was not the result of a manifest clerical error, this department was without authority to remit the additional duties assessed in accordance with the law.

It appears that linoleum sold in England was invoiced at a price including the freight from the point of shipment in England to the place of delivery in the United States; that for a number of years prior to July 1, 1907, it had been the practice in appraising linoleums to deduct the amount of freight from the purchase price of same to ascertain the foreign market value thereon; and that, in accordance with this practice, the importers in making entry of linoleums always deducted the freight allowances, and declared in their entry the invoice value of the merchandise less the amount allowed them for freight from England to the place of delivery in the United States.

The published reports of reappraisements for the week ended June 24, 1907, Reappraisement Nos. 10879, 10881, and 10948 show reappraisements on linoleums wherein the deduction of freight was allowed. All reappraisements of linoleums made subsequent to July 1, 1907, however, show that the deductions for freight were disallowed.

This department has no record of the evidence upon which the Board of General Appraisers changed their ruling and decided that the freight charges should be added to make the market value, nor whether these importers had notice of the change of the rule of the general appraisers as to the market value of this merchandise.

It does appear, however, that it was the practice of these importers to enter their merchandise at the value which had been affirmed by the Board of General Appraisers as the correct market value, and that there was no intention on their part to undervalue the said merchandise or to evade the payment of duty thereon.

Respectfully,

FRANKLIN MACVEAGH, Secretary.

FORT GRANT MILITARY RESERVATION, ARIZ.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The bill (S. 6799) granting to the State of Arizona the Fort Grant Military Reservation for an industrial school, and for other purposes, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. I find that that reservation has been turned over to the Interior Department and is now subject to that jurisdiction. I therefore ask the reference of the bill to the Committee on Public Lands.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Committee on Military Affairs will be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it will be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

ANNA I. WOOD.

Mr. BRIGGS. I am directed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate resolution 303, to report it with an amendment, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

The amendment was, in line 2, after the word "pay," to insert "from the contingent fund of the Senate," so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay from the contingent fund of the Senate to Anna I. Wood, widow of the late Thomas Wood, laborer of the United States Senate, a sum equal to six months' salary at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. JONES submitted an amendment relative to the wages of workmen, clerks, and other employees at the assay office at Seattle, Wash., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, etc., appropriation bill (H. R. 24023), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $800 for the salary of a shipping commissioner at Bath, Me., intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, etc., appropriation bill (H. EIGHT-HOUR LAW.

Mr. BORAH. I desire to state that on Monday next, after the routine morning business, I will ask the Senate to consider House bill 9061, known as the eight-hour bill.

REPEAL OF RECIPROCITY ACT.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3316) to repeal an act entitled "An act to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes," approved July 26, 1911.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, of course in due time I will have no objection to considering the bill, but I will ask the Senator to consent to let it go over for to-day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho withdraw the request?

Mr. HEYBURN. Let it stand on the objection. That is an objection to present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is an objection, but the Senator from Missouri put it so nicely the Chair thought perhaps he did not wish to put it in the form of an objection. The bill goes over on the objection of the Senator from Missouri.

REPORTS RELATING TO COTTON.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I ask for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14052) authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to issue certain reports relating to cotton. The bill is on the calendar and was objected to when called up before, and now there is no objection to it, I understand. It will lead, I presume, to no discussion. It is simply to change the date from June to July for the acreage report, and all concerned, both North and South, are interested that the bill shall be passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina asks for the present consideration of House bill 14052, which will be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to know what special occasion there is for considering the bill at this time. Unless there is some——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The Secretary of Agriculture, I will say to the Senator from Idaho, desires to avoid the expense incident to getting the June preliminary report, which is subject to correction, under the law, in July. The bill proposes to make one report, which will give the final acreage seeded to cotton.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will not object to anything that proposes to make one blade of grass grow where two have heretofore grown.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with an amendment, to strike out section 2, lines 8 to 13, inclusive, on page 1, in the following words:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of Agriculture shall cause the Bureau of Statistics of the Department of Agriculture to issue a report, on or about the first Mondays in August, September, and October of each year, showing the condition of the cotton crop of the United States on these respective dates.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture be directed to cause the Bureau of Statistics of the Department of Agriculture to issue a report, on or about the first Monday in July of each year, showing by States and in total the number of acres of cotton then in cultivation in the United States.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of Agriculture shall cause the Bureau of Statistics of the Department of Agriculture to issue each year, immediately following the publication of the ginning report of the Census Bureau of December 1, an estimate of the total production of cotton in the United States for the current crop year.

SEC. 3. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the foregoing provisions be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the sections will be renumbered.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

THE METAL SCHEDULE.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of House bill 18642.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to now consider the unfinished business. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 18642) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, in what I say at this time I shall speak entirely from a business man's point of view. While I do not underestimate in the least the importance of the larger and more abstract problems of government, I am more interested in those which have to do with its practical conduct under existing conditions of constitutional development and of legislative control. There are many lessons of economy, system, and attention to the work in hand that can be learned by administrators and legislators from men who have been occupied chiefly with commercial affairs and can be helpful in insuring, to some extent, the proper and profitable transaction of business. Much has been heard within the past year or two of economy and efficiency in the public service. Many broad and somewhat vague statements on that subject have been indulged in; many extreme assertions have been made. But, whatever may be done in reorganizing the administrative conduct of affairs, it is certain that much more may be accomplished by the legislative branch of the Government. It would be possible to transform our whole system, to reduce its cost enormously, and to cut down in corresponding proportion the burden resting upon the public if we were willing to shape legislation along the lines of greatest economic effectiveness. I shall endeavor to show how far, in my judgment, the present system of tariff legislation, as illustrated by the schedule of duties now under consideration, departs from the standard of businesslike administration.

The first practical question concerning the tariff is to what extent that system conforms to the system of government in this country. Nothing is more productive of friction and waste in the operation of any concern, whether governmental or commercial, than an attempt to employ methods which do not agree with the purposes for which it was created or out of harmony with the essential principles of its organization. The present tariff system of the United States is subject to this criticism. It was begun in 1789 as a source of revenue, and for that purpose alone; it was continued in the tariff acts of 1816, 1824, and 1828 for the purpose of promoting one set of industries and one part of the country at the expense of another; and it was sad experience which, after 1832, forced the country to a gradual abandonment of the protective idea and a return to the revenue principle in the tariffs of 1846 and 1857. Only the exigencies of civil war could have restored the protective system in all its unfairness and with all of its inconsistencies and jokers. It has continued to the present day as the result of peculiar conditions in American politics, combined with the powerful influence of manufacturers who were resolved to maintain the advantages they had gained through war-revenue legislation.

Mr. President, it has long been the opinion of many able lawyers that our customs system is distinctly opposed to the intent of the Constitution of the United States. That document authorizes Congress to lay imposts, duties, and excises, and under this provision the levying of tariff duties for a revenue purpose can be fully justified. Indeed, the organization of the United States upon its present basis was partly, at least, dictated by a desire to render uniform the systems of duties which were then in vogue in the several colonies. But this is far from being an assertion that the tariff as at present used represents a constitutional exercise of the taxing power. The confessed purpose of many of the duties now levied is that of redistributing the property of the community by enabling domestic manufacturers to charge higher prices for their goods than they otherwise could. As the Supreme Court of the United States has expressed the matter in the leading case of Loan Association v. Topeka (20 Wall., 655)—

> We have established, we think, beyond cavil, that there can be no lawful tax which is not laid for a public purpose. It may not be easy to draw the line in all cases so as to decide what is a public purpose in this sense and what is not.

But easy or hard, Mr. President, the fact remains that the levy of taxation for a purpose which is not public is an unconstitutional exercise of power. This view is sustained not merely by the case which I have cited but by a long line of unbroken decisions running through the history of our highest tribunal. I am aware that there are those who would hasten to defend the tariff as at present levied upon the ground that, though admittedly protective, the protection has been sought for a public purpose or that it results in public benefit. That I absolutely deny. But even though it be granted that the purpose of the protection is a public one, and even though it be conceded—what by no stretch of the imagination can be admitted—that the effect of the protection is generally beneficial, it still remains true that the collection of duties for such a purpose would not be warrantable. This point was fully covered in the case of Lowell v. The City of Boston, in which that city was restrained from issuing its bonds to raise a fund for use by way of loans in rebuilding the portion of the city destroyed by fire in November, 1872. Certainly here was a worthy object, one fully in the interest of the community, yet involving an appropriation of public funds to private purposes. As such it was held unconstitutional by the supreme judicial court of the Commonwealth (111 Mass., p. 444), and this point of view has been repeatedly sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Neither can it be alleged by those who would apologize for protection that it may be constitutionally sustained because the use of this method of taxation for a private purpose—the upbuilding of private enterprises—is merely incidental to the use of the taxing power and does not involve a direct diversion of the funds thus collected after they have reached the Public Treasury. Our courts are equally as clear in their holding that the use of this power of taxation for the purpose of redistributing property or of discriminating between persons is as unfair and as unconstitutional as if the money had been paid out of the Public Treasury to advance the interests of one class in the community at the expense of others, provided such use of the power is the chief purpose and not a mere incident to its exercise. Even in the classical case of Veazie Bank v. Fenno (8 Wall., p. 533), involving the 10 per cent tax on State-bank notes imposed by Congress for the admitted purpose of preventing the circulation of the notes, the Supreme Court of the United States, contrary to general assumption, failed to uphold the tax in this light. True, it essentially sustained the 10 per cent tax as the exercise of a special power bestowed by the Constitution—that of regulating the circulation of money. But it declined to rebut the argument of counsel for the bank that the use of taxation for the purpose of injuring or impairing the privileges of the bank was unconstitutional. To this argument it merely replied that "the judicial can not prescribe to the legislative department of the Government limitations upon the exercise of its acknowledged power." The unlimited power of the character of taxation thus vindicated was not, however, and has never been regarded as incapable of being wrongly exercised. If the power of the courts to restrain the unconstitutional exercise of the taxing authority be relatively feeble, there is the more reason for keeping the legislation which embodies it within the limits required by the plain dictates of the Constitution.

Not being a lawyer, I should not care to discuss the constitutionality of the tariff if the question were simply academic. But the unjust use of tariff duties for the purpose of changing the direction of industry is as unbusinesslike as it is unconstitutional. As legislators we should aim at a better conception of the Government of the United States as a business concern organized for the performance of specified duties in a businesslike way and without any unnecessary expenditure or waste of resources. To secure this desirable result thoughtful men who are not wholly controlled by considerations of self-interest, or what is popularly known as "politics," are essential to the administration of laws as well as in making laws. It is the fundamental law of business that an enterprise shall be self-sustaining and that it shall not unnecessarily draw upon its resources at one time or prevent itself from gaining access to them at another. How does the tariff stand from this point of view? Experience shows that it is a most unreliable source of revenue. During the past 20 years it has alternately produced a surplus and a deficit. The possession of the surpluses has invariably led to extravagance and inflated expenditures. The deficits have necessitated the issuance of bonds or the imposition of additional taxes, which combine with the tariff to produce another inflation. It was a condition of this kind, inherited by President Cleveland in 1893, which necessitated the bond issues of his administration in order to supply the shortage of revenue due to the unduly protective McKinley tariff law, with its provision for enormously expensive sugar bounties. Viewing the United States Government as a business corporation organized for the distinct purpose set forth in the Constitution, I do not hesitate to say that it is the duty of Congress to collect from the people the funds which are needed to sustain that Government in the most economical manner by the use of the taxing power in such a way as will least reduce the resources of the community and yet subject them to the smallest tax or strain necessary.

With our enormously inflated rates of duty, it is an obvious demand of common sense that Congress should at the earliest opportunity set itself to the reduction and equalization of the various schedules. This, Mr. President, is not a suggestion of free trade, which, I think, is impracticable at the present time, however desirable it may be in theory. The Treasury could not endure the loss of much, if any, of the present customs revenue. But, Mr. President, I am perfectly certain that the people of the United States properly demand an immediate and thorough readjustment of duties so as to eliminate, so far as possible, all special protection, place our producers upon a competitive basis, and reduce duties to a point where our manufacturers will have to expect competition when unreasonable or unfair advances in prices are attempted. I do not believe that this program contains the slightest element of danger to the business community. On the contrary, it would positively strengthen industry, eliminate many unwholesome and dishonest practices, and call forth resources and economies which are not now resorted to because of the absolute monopoly of our domestic market. It would, moreover, meet the main evil of the present situation. That evil, Mr. President, is nothing more nor less than uncertainty. Far too much has been said about the effect of reduction of the tariff in interfering with business; far too little about the effect of continued discussion and debate upon the temper and capacity of business men. There can be no doubt that the chief danger to business at present is not the danger of reduction, still less the actual reduction of rates, but it is the uncertainty by which the whole subject is attended and surrounded. I do not believe that the best plan to secure tariff quiet is to let the tariff alone. That is not possible. The country is aroused. It will not endure the indefinite continuance of the existing schedules. It absolutely insists upon reasonable and immediate revision. The pressure upon Congress for action will continue until the demand is met and satisfied by sincere, businesslike legislation. From such legislation the business of the country has absolutely nothing to dread.

Yet, in spite of the manifest demand for this kind of honesty in the treatment of the subject, it seems almost impossible to secure rational consideration of the question of reducing duties, still less a moderate degree of fairness in the discussion of any particular bill. The House of Representatives some weeks ago sent to the Senate a measure reducing the tariff on steel. But this bill has received no attention on the floor until within the last few days, and its consideration in the Finance Committee of this body has been largely partisan and one-sided.

Mr. President, I regret to say that I find what almost amounts to pig-headedness and intolerance with reference to tariff reduction that it is difficult indeed to understand. It has often seemed to me during the recent hearings before the Finance Committee that a self-respecting man could not appear as a witness if he intended to suggest the desirability of reducing duties. Both before the Finance Committee, and in times past before Republican Ways and Means Committees of the House of Representatives, nothing has so surely subjected a witness to sarcasm, distortion of his remarks, and even personal insinuation, not to say insult, as the suggestion that the duties in some existing schedule were higher than they ought to be. Protectionist members of these committees have apparently constituted themselves defenders and advocates, if not counsel, for manufacturers whose object was not merely that of preventing an injurious general reduction in the tariff duties, but who were insistent upon being sustained in their enjoyment of special tariff favors which enabled them to market their own products at prices far above those possible under any reasonable system of duties. I regret that such an attitude should ever be adopted by those who are placed in a judicial or legislative position and whose duty it is to hold the scales even, that they may obtain the evidence needed in the revision of existing law. The correction of this evil is demanded by the people of the country as well as by business principles, and has no special reference to the tariff question, although the latest and perhaps the worst illustration of it has been furnished in the partisan tactics lately adopted toward witnesses before the Finance Committee.

But the refusal to give the slightest heed to tariff reform is not solely confined to Congress.

I have no intention, Mr. President, of offering any improper criticism of the Chief Executive of this Nation. Yet it remains true that President Taft and ex-President Roosevelt have cooperated with the opponents of tariff revision in this body to prevent the enactment of any satisfactory measure designed to relieve the public of its present great burden. The President has had much to say of tariff revision, yet when actual measures have reached him he has not scrupled to return them with a veto. His only positive action for the reduction of the tariff during his term of office has been negotiation of the reciprocity treaty with Canada. A bill carrying this treaty into effect was passed by the Senate and the House of Representatives largely by the aid of Democratic votes given merely because of the belief that the reciprocity proposal was at all events a step forward.

How unfortunate it was, Mr. President, that the Executive of this great country should have been practically driven to a "deal" in order to get votes for his reciprocity agreement with Canada by agreeing to veto the tariff bills that were to be sent to him at the special session. Yet this is the sole possible explanation of the remarkable conduct of President Taft in refusing to the country the relief from tariff oppression to which it was entitled. Very early in the special session President Taft allowed it to be definitely understood that the session had been called solely for the purpose of authorizing the Canadian reciprocity agreement, and that he was not prepared to consider or accept any measure that might come to him upon other subjects. It was a matter of common knowledge among the Republican Members of Congress that President Taft had taken this position simply because he believed that the reciprocity arrangement would tend to reduce the cost of living, and would thereby relieve or check the outcry against unreasonable duties which was then growing too loud to be ignored. True, the Executive technically based his vetoes upon the absence of a report from the Tariff Board upon any of the schedules then sent him.

But the President of this Nation can not expect Members of this Congress to entertain for the views of the Tariff Board a greater regard than he himself displays. In framing the Canadian reciprocity agreement he entirely ignored the Tariff Board, for he did not call its members into consultation until after the agreement had been shaped. Although they supplied him with a report which showed an average difference in the cost of production of news print paper between this country and Canada of $4.45 per ton, he persisted in urging upon Congress the enactment of a measure which would have resulted in making pulp and paper free of duty. He did more than this, for he secured the reconstruction of the reciprocity measure in such a way as to make this reduction upon pulp and paper entirely independent of the action of Canada in accepting the general agreement, and this removal of the duties upon tax-free pulp and paper is to-day actually in effect, resulting in admitting into this country entirely free of duty about 70 per cent of the total importations of those articles from Canada. How grotesque and absurd it was, then, for the Executive to request Congress to await the reports of the Tariff Board before acting upon the subject which had been committed to its charge by an unmistakable popular mandate. No adequate explanation of President Taft's position can be afforded, except the unfortunate necessity to which he was subject of obtaining the votes of certain members of his own party by guaranteeing to certain special interests a further continuance of the tariff duties which the President himself had denounced as absolutely "indefensible," and which were recognized by the country over as being hopelessly obsolete, unfair, and ill adapted to present conditions. I hope the same outcome will not meet the pending bill, although definite reports prevail throughout this Chamber that the President will veto any measure revising the tariff on iron and steel, no matter how reasonable may be its terms, because of the lack of a report on that subject from the Tariff Board.

In what position does this place the Commissioner of Corporations, who for more than four years has been engaged, with the aid of a large staff of expert assistants, in investigating the steel industry? He has examined the subject from every point of view and has recently devoted a large volume to the publication of an analysis of the cost of producing iron and steel. Does not the President's attitude imply that no inquiry can be accepted as final on the iron and steel schedule unless it is conducted by specially chosen agents who are "reliable" on the tariff question? How does this attitude affect the Immigration Commission, which spent nearly $800,000 in preparing for Congress a report in which the iron and steel industries figured to a very large degree? Where does it leave the Bureau of Labor and the staff of trained economists and investigators employed by that organization in several important studies of iron and steel?

All of this information giving definite and convincing evidence of the need for reduction in the iron and steel schedule has been so ably presented by the Senator from Iowa that I will not even attempt to quote it. The threat of veto under these circumstances, irrespective of what the terms of the proposed bill may be, shows an utter indifference to the idea of tariff revision put forward by the administration as one of its cardinal policies and convicts it at once either of political deceit and evasion or of absurdity.

It is well known that reformation of the tariff is an article of faith with those who are known as "Progressives." Yet, I remember that the archprogressive of all, who is now pushing his own campaign for a third term in the Presidency, was in the White House for seven years without ever lifting a finger to secure a revision of the tariff. It can not be said that this total indifference on the part of former President Roosevelt was due to ignorance, for as far back as 1902 he considered the propriety of recommending to Congress the appointment of a tariff commission, whose duty it should be to prepare a revision of the schedules upon which some action might be based.

But while Mr. Roosevelt was insistent and persistent upon all kinds of legislation and in his general efforts to regulate all forms of business activity, he could not be induced even to make a genuine demand for the tentative notion of reform which he had thus conceived. He allowed one of the worst tariffs ever placed on the statute books—the Dingley Act of 1897—to continue in operation absolutely without disturbance throughout the whole seven years, which, as he himself announced, are to be considered two terms in the White House. This is Mr. Roosevelt's record as a tariff reformer. It should be borne in mind by those who are now sending abroad his criticisms of President Taft's action in signing the tariff act of 1909 and in praising that unfair and partisan enactment as "the best ever." There is nothing to be expected from President Roosevelt with reference to the tariff should he again enter the White House. Experience has shown him as one who had not the courage to attack this fundamental problem, knowing, as he did, that the foundations of his party supremacy were laid upon tariff favoritism and special privileges.

Efforts to secure action in this very Chamber have shown that the same form of particularism and localism, characteristic of the ultra-standpat tariff leaders on the Republican side of the Chamber, is equally characteristic of some of the progressives. They were not willing to assent to reciprocity, because it reduced the rates on grain and agricultural products generally in that northwestern region where they expected to capture votes. They are not willing to-day to join with Democrats in an attempt to reduce the duties on raw wool. The flockmasters of Wisconsin, Wyoming, Washington, and other States have the same influence with them as do the manufacturers of pig iron and steel rails with the gentlemen who are now seeking to uphold the present rates of duty in the metal schedule. The Senator from Idaho, who is apparently so earnest in his assault upon the trusts, will not consent to a cut in the duties on lead and zinc, notwithstanding that these necessary substances are to-day largely regulated in price by one of the greatest trusts in the United States.

No; there is nothing to be hoped by the public from those whose progressivism is halted by the interest of those manufacturers and growers among their constituents who are to-day profiting from abnormal duties and whose fortunes are built up by the receipt of excessive prices for the wool the poor man needs for his blankets or for the metals that furnish the material for a hundred other necessaries of life.

It would seem, Mr. President, that there is little to be expected by way of tariff revision, either now or in the future, which can reasonably be foreseen from any source other than the Democratic Party. To that party the country owes every genuine effort to secure the reduction of the tariff within recent years. From that party and from that alone comes the impulse for the actual reduction of duties to-day. And it was no mistaken understanding of the industrial situation that led to the presentation of a bill for the reduction of the rates on iron and steel before any other schedule at this session of Congress. President Taft had rejected measures dealing both with cottons and woolens. He had called for scientific information on every schedule that was to be dealt with. On the steel schedule and the steel industry in general there was such information in abundance. Steel is the chief requisite of manufacture. Except for the products of our farms and our mines, which are perhaps more fundamental to industry, it lies absolutely at the root of all other industrial undertakings, since it supplies the raw material of production. To-day the country is suffering from high prices for iron and steel products—prices that have been exacted as the result of combinations and agreements. To-day the average rate of duty under existing laws is about 34 to 37 per cent, including in the average all items affected by the metal schedule. We propose to reduce it to about 19 to 22 per cent. What reason is there for this action? What good arguments are there against it?

In 1901 the United States Steel Corporation was chartered with a total capitalization of $1,400,000,000. At the end of its first 10 years of existence this corporation has added to its investment in tangible property about $500,000,000, or an average of $50,000,000 a year. The Bureau of Corporations estimates that the total investment of the concern in 1900 was $698,869,756, or substantially only 50 per cent of the total capitalization with which it started. The same authority estimates its investment in tangible property in 1910 as $1,186,982,038, the difference being about $448,000,000. Whether we accept the estimate of the Bureau of Corporations as to the value of the property in 1901 or not, the fact remains that nearly half a billion dollars has been added to the actual tangible investment during the first 10 years of the concern's life. There has been an average earning of 12 per cent on the total invested property during the decade in question, the gross average earnings amounting to not less than $112,856,498 annually. Of this great sum the half billion to which reference has already been made has been used to reduce the discrepancy between real valuations and par values, while more than that amount has gone as dividends upon the vast volume outstanding of securities. Charles M. Schwab, one of the foremost steel experts in the country, in an authorized interview in a New York paper, Saturday, May 11, predicted that the earnings of the United States Steel Co. in the next 10 or 15 years would be more than $200,000,000 annually. What a compliment it is, Mr. President, to the ability and capacity of those who organized and conducted the United States Steel Corporation that they have been able to pay handsome returns upon so immense a volume of outstanding securities with less than 50 cents on the dollar of actual tangible property behind them. What a tribute it is to the charitable attitude of the United States Government in permitting and maintaining conditions that practically prohibited importation of many of the classes of manufactures controlled by the United States Steel Corporation. It is a part of the general beneficence which has led Congress to create conditions whereby manufacturers and parts of the country that enjoyed special favor at the hands of the legislative body could successfully and without interference levy a tribute upon the consuming classes for the sake of their own prosperity.

But, Mr. President, it is often stated that while the United States Steel Corporation has been successful in maintaining itself and in paying dividends upon its immense burden of stocks and bonds, as the Bureau of Corporations has so clearly shown, the same does not hold good of the so-called independent interests. Professional apologists for excessive tariff rates have told us that a reduction of the tariff designed to curb the trusts will have no effect except that of driving out the so-called "small" men in the industry and of leaving the larger concerns to occupy the field. It seems to me that this argument positively passes the limit of human credulity. Can it be believed that foreign manufacturers situated at a distance and subject to all the disadvantages of cost of transportation, to say nothing of inferior natural resources in the production of steel and iron, would be able to subject these independent concerns to an extremity of competition that had not been visited upon them by the monopoly with which they must compete at home? The logic of the case is all against so violent and impossible a conclusion. But fortunately, Mr. President, we have the actual facts in the case to show the absurdity of such an assertion. The Bureau of Corporations has carefully compiled the percentage of each kind of iron and steel product as compared with the total output of the United States that is turned out by the so-called independent companies. From this computation it appears that in the aggregate the percentage of the total production of the United States controlled by the steel corporation fell off heavily between 1901 and 1910. Its proportion of the production of nearly all steel products, with the exception of steel rails, very sharply declined, while its production of iron ore during the same period fell from about 60 per cent of the total to about 51 per cent. The conclusion is inevitable that the independent interests are amply able to maintain their position against the United States Steel Corporation, whether with or without the tariff. If they can maintain themselves against the steel corporation, they can maintain themselves against any steel-manufacturing organization in the world. They have nothing to fear from a change in the tariff any more than has the steel corporation itself.

Another excellent index to the present strength of the iron and steel industry is seen in the remarkable success had by the domestic producers in building up an export trade. The compiled figures which I herewith submit show the extent of this movement and indicate that the total exports of iron and steel and their products were $230,725,351 in 1911, against $14,716,524 in 1880, or a growth of more than 16 times in 32 years.

But creditable as has been this development of the foreign trade, it should be remembered that the farming interests of the country have done much more to develop our trade with foreign countries. Our farmers have thus done far more to bring about a favorable balance of trade than have our steel and iron manufacturers. The testimony of all recent investigations, the showing of the Bureau of Corporations, the hearings before congressional committees, bear out the view that an effective, well-organized, and well-located steel plant has nothing to fear. The growth of the independent business proves it.

But, Mr. President, I am not an extremist. I do not urge an immediate breach with the policy which has been developed in this country throughout a long series of years. I should be glad if the Christian Science doctrine, advocated by the Senator from California, could be applied to our industrial system. I am confident that if our manufacturers would only think they had the power to stand alone they could do so. But since they will not, it would be too radical a departure from the past to deprive them suddenly of all the protection they have heretofore enjoyed. The bill which is now before us does not propose to do that. It retains an adequate rate of duty upon practically every product throughout the whole list except those whose manufacturers have unmistakably demonstrated their power to control the trade and whose products are exported from the United States instead of being imported, and those fundamental raw materials which are needed by the industry, and protection to which can serve no purpose except to enable their owners to draw a monopoly profit through their control of ore deposits. On the average, the bill fixes a rate estimated at from 19 to 22.4 per cent ad valorem. This is a reduction of but 15 per cent from the level of the rates fixed in the present law. The substitute measure which has been prepared by the Senator from Iowa compromises between the levels of duty afforded by the present law and the bill which has been passed by the House of Representatives, since it would fix an estimated average ad valorem of perhaps 25 per cent. There can be no question that a rate of 20 per cent on the average is ample. Upon the convincing argument made by the Senator from Iowa himself I believe that a jury would fix the average at less than 20 per cent. However, 20 per cent furnishes a sufficient measure of protection to those less efficient plants which may have been depending upon the tariff and gives them an opportunity to readjust their business affairs on such a basis as will correspond to the altered rates of duty.

A reduction only to the extent proposed by the Senator from Iowa would, in my judgment, be entirely unsatisfactory. It would not remove a sufficient proportion of the present tariff burden to enable us to get relief from existing high prices. I think, moreover, that the measure proposed by the Senator from Iowa is unwise in many of the rates which it includes, and that this maladjustment of rates is in itself enough to call for the rejection of the measure, even if the general or average level of duties should be deemed sufficient.

But there is another and more important reason why the bill proposed by the Senator from Iowa can not be considered acceptable. It seeks to abandon the ad valorem basis of duties proposed in the House measures and to return to the specific system. Mr. President, in my judgment, the use of the ad valorem system in the House bill was one of the features which most genuinely entitled it to approbation. The system of specific duties embodied in existing laws has been thoroughly discredited. It has tended to put the protective rate up to an unreasonably high point, relatively speaking, whenever iron and steel prices fell, while it has kept them at a relatively low point whenever they rose. Thus it has tended, on every occasion, to defeat all possibility of importations, no matter how strongly the conditions prevalent at the time might call for them. The customary apology for specific rates is that they are easier to assess in those cases where values are difficult to ascertain and that they avoid undervaluation. That may be true in certain instances. But there is no difficulty in establishing the worth of a consignment of steel rails. They have a known market price which is as well recognized as the price of wheat. It is not necessary to quarrel about the valuation of a consignment of pig iron. There is no need of a difference of opinion regarding the price of an importation of wire nails. The ad valorem system can be applied to the steel schedule with as little difficulty as it can to any schedule throughout the tariff. It should be so applied. And whatever the rates of the bill to be adopted by the Senate may be, they should be prescribed on a basis of valuation rather than of weight. There is still another consideration which militates strongly in favor of the House bill and against that of the Senator from Iowa. The House measure placed upon the free list a number of important articles. These were not chosen for reasons relating to protection or free trade. Like many other items in the iron and steel schedule, they needed no protection. They were placed upon the free list for the same reasons which control in the making of any free list. Their fundamental necessity in carrying on the agricultural operations of the country and the desire, so far as possible, to exempt them from that control of prices which is rendered easier by the existence of tariff duties were the reasons for relieving them of duty. The barbed wire, cotton ties, nails, machinery, and other products which were relieved of duty in the House bill should undoubtedly be left upon the free list. The Senator from Iowa has restored them to their dutiable position. He has, in my judgment, acted erroneously in so doing.

While I am stating my views with respect to the duties on steel, I desire to call attention to an amendment to the pending measure which I wish to submit and for which I ask the attention of this body. This amendment provides that the President of the United States shall be vested with authority to suspend any given rates of duty statutory at the time the action is taken if, from considerations of public policy, he may deem best to take such action. The necessity for such action has been demonstrated over and over again within the past few years, but I shall allude to but two instances in support of it. During the disastrous coal strike in 1902 conditions would have been very much relieved had it been possible for the Executive at that time to admit coal free to the United States by the exercise of an authority bestowed upon him through some express provision of law. As it was, an effort was made to admit the coal under as favorable conditions as possible through interpretations of the law which permitted it in some cases to enter without payment of duties. The relief thus given was, however, only very limited and the process was hampered by the difficulty of administrative officials in complying, at least technically, with the terms of the existing act.

In this instance there could have been no possible objection to the admission of the coal free of duty, even from American producers who believe in a tariff upon coal. The freer importation of coal would have tended simply to have relieved suffering without in the least degree affecting home industry. Another striking example is afforded by the experience of the past winter in the importation of potatoes. A short crop last season led to a rapid advance in price, the charge reaching a maximum of $1.25 per bushel wholesale during the winter. This shortage led to the control of the supply in the Middle West, and prices were raised to such an extent as to render the importation of potatoes profitable and necessary. I have here a tabular statement which I shall insert in my remarks showing the increase of importation for the first three months of 1912 as compared with the same period of 1911 that took place last year as a result of the monopolization of the domestic supply:

Imports of potatoes (except sweet potatoes) into the United States during the first 3 months of 1911 and the same period of 1912.

Month.	1911		1912
	Quantity.	Value.	Quantity.	Value.
	Bushels.	Dollars.	Bushels.	Dollars.
January	20,876	21,912	1,706,214	874,205
February	24,570	32,697	2,505,751	1,270,589
March	23,294	32,767	2,532,060	1,274,270
Total, 3 months	68,740	87,376	6,744,025	3,419,065

In fact, prices have been so regulated that potatoes could be shipped in from abroad and distributed on a competitive basis without loss as far west as the Ohio River. Beyond that point the territory was controlled by certain Chicago monopolistic interests, which had succeeded in purchasing the available western supply, and who so often have shown themselves to be experts in controlling the prices of foodstuffs. In this instance a satisfactory showing to the President of the United States establishing the existence of such a combination in the potato market should have been sufficient to bring about the issuance of an order suspending the tariff on the imported article in the interests of the consuming public had the amendment which I am advocating been at that time a part of the law. That the President can constitutionally exercise the function of suspending tariff duties under specific conditions is well established, having been sustained by the Supreme Court in leading cases—Fields v. Clark, Boyd v. United States, and Steinbach v. United States (United States Reports, vol. 143, pp. 649, etc.). In those cases, Mr. President, it was held by the court that Congress could vest the President with power to suspend the application of a tariff duty under conditions which should be set forth in the law, his function being purely ministerial and involving no infringement whatever upon the exercise of the legislative power which is constitutionally exercised by Congress alone.

How would this provision operate in the case of a schedule such as that now under consideration? It is a notorious fact that steel prices have been sustained by combinations formed for the express purpose of determining the rates of sale of the different items. This has been fully established by the elaborate and careful inquiry into the condition of the steel industry which has been conducted during the past winter by a special committee of the House of Representatives. This, in fact, is one of the chief grounds of complaint mentioned in the bill filed by the Department of Justice in its suits against the United States Steel Corporation. How much more effective would it have been had President Taft been in a position to inform the masters of the steel industry that further persistence in the agreements which were being used to maintain the high level of prices would be followed by a complete suspension of the tariff on all items thus affected?

For years past it has been known upon the most unquestionable authority that American sewing machines and other articles of similar description, including agricultural implements, have been sold abroad at prices very much less than those realized for them in the United States. At the present time a tariff duty of 30 per cent is levied upon sewing machines and other articles of a similar description. Would not it have been far more effective than a suit to penalize the National Cash Register Co. for its monopolistic practices had the President been able to say to it that the suspension of the tariff duties upon the product would immediately follow further persistence in the illegal agreements used for the purpose of maintaining excessive prices to consumers? I do not think the question is open to a moment's debate. I have shown that it is not possible for the United States under present conditions to abolish the tariff, since our Federal finances are so largely based upon the customs-revenue system. But it is entirely within the limits of practicability to remove the danger which inheres in all tariff duties by bestowing upon the administrative authorities the power which I demand for them, in order that they may be effectively armed against combinations expressly designed through increased prices to increase the cost of living.

Add this proviso to the proposed House bill for the revision of the steel schedule; enact the measure promptly into law, let the President give it his approval, and the question of steel duties can be laid aside for a period of years. The industry will not suffer in the least. This will not, however, occur, in my judgment, until next year, when our tariff schedule will be signed by a Democratic President.

If there be factories that are so inefficiently conducted that they can not subsist without public bounty afforded through the maintenance of exorbitant rates of duty on their product, it would be far better for the country that they should cease their operations rather than endeavor to sustain themselves under artificial conditions, which can sustain them only at the cost of a handicap to all industries that are forced to depend upon them for material. Give up the fiction that American labor and American manufacturers can not do as efficient work as those of other countries. There is no truth in such a statement. Our most successful industries are those in which we have accepted the competition of the world; our least successful those in which we have protected inefficiency and placed a handicap upon capacity. The steel industry has prospered in the past partly because its protection has been steadily reduced. It has not been able to hide behind the tariff wall to the same extent as was true of the woolen textile business or sugar refining. But, Mr. President, it has reached the point where, after 15 years of enjoyment of high duties, it is amply able to endure a reduction and will profit instead of suffering from it. The tentative reduction afforded by the tariff of 1909 need not be considered for it amounts to nothing. We cut the protection afforded by that measure, but we did not lower it beyond the point where a domestic manufacturer did not have absolute control over all things in sight. The time is ripe to take more genuine and more effective action. The country demands it; the Democratic Party will act next year.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am not feeling as well as I wish I were to-day, but this bill has been on the calendar for some time and I know that all members of the Finance Committee are anxious that it should be disposed of at the earliest possible moment. It is for that reason that I shall begin to-day what I have to say and finish my remarks at some future time.

I do not claim that all the rates in the present steel schedule are just what they should be. I know that conditions in business have changed and do change as years pass by. But, after listening to the testimony given before the Finance Committee, I am positive that, without additional information, it would be unwise to undertake a revision of this schedule, a schedule that involves nearly 25,000 industrial concerns in this country, an industry that is employing a million and a half workmen, an industry which produces in manufactured articles nearly $4,000,000,000. I think that Congress should hesitate before radically changing present duties, especially if the information at its command and the testimony which has been given before the committee will not justify such a change.

We have before us the House bill, and the majority of the Finance Committee of the Senate has reported that bill adversely. Since the bill was reported to the Senate the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] has offered an amendment to the House bill. I asked the Senate to have printed a comparison of schedule C—that is, a comparison of the rates as provided in the House bill, the rates of the present law, and the rates provided in the Cummins amendment, as well as the equivalent ad valorems of each. That information, Mr. President, has been laid upon the desk of every Senator and, no doubt, Senators have in turn studied the comparisons.

But I wish to call the attention of the Senate to one thing that I have noticed particularly in the comparison. I speak now of the House bill and the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. I notice that a great many of the items in the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa carry a less rate of duty than the House bill. That is the case more particularly upon the heavy steel products, while the House bill upon the greater number of items carrying a lower rate than that provided in the Cummins amendment is upon the highly finished products of the industry—that is, upon the items made by the smaller concerns of the country; and I believe that, taking the industry as a whole, there are more men employed in making the higher finished products that carry a lower rate in the House bill than does the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa than there are in making the heavy steel products.

Let us examine the comparison and note some of the rates in the amendment of the Senator from Iowa that are lower than those in the House bill.

First, iron in pigs. The equivalent ad valorem provided for in the Cummins amendment, that is, the total, is 6.16 per cent, whereas the bill of the House carries 8 per cent.

Ferro-manganese, the next item. The House provides an equivalent ad valorem of 15 per cent, the Cummins amendment 2.63 per cent, while the present law provides an equivalent ad valorem duty of 6.52 per cent; in other words, ferro-manganese in the Democratic bill has been increased over the present rate by nearly 250 per cent.

The next item is chrome or chromium. The Cummins amendment provides for an equivalent ad valorem duty of 4.88 per cent; the House bill for a duty of 8 per cent.

The next is slabs, blooms, loops, or other forms less finished than iron in bars. On these the Cummins amendment provides an equivalent ad valorem duty of 6.21 per cent; the House bill carries a duty of 10 per cent.

In that same paragraph items in which the manufacture of charcoal is used as fuel the Cummins amendment provides an equivalent ad valorem duty of 8.71 per cent; the Democratic House bill of 10 per cent.

Bar iron, bars, and billets in the manufacture of which charcoal is used as fuel the Cummins amendment provides an equivalent ad valorem duty of 7.95 per cent; the House bill of 10 per cent.

On muck bars the Cummins amendment imposes an equivalent ad valorem duty of 9.74 per cent; the House of 10 per cent.

On flat iron not less than 1 inch wide nor less than three-eighths of an inch in diameter, bars or shapes of rolled or hammered bar iron, the Cummins amendment provides an equivalent ad valorem duty of 6.47 per cent, whereas the House bill imposes 10 per cent.

On round iron, not less than seven-sixteenths of an inch in diameter, the Cummins amendment imposes an equivalent ad valorem duty of 7.22 per cent, and the House bill 10 per cent.

The next item is beams, girders, joists, angles, channels, T T columns and posts, and other items valued at nine-tenths of a cent per pound or less the Cummins amendment provides an equivalent ad valorem duty of 11.50 per cent, and the House provides 15 per cent; valued above eight-tenths of a cent per pound and not above 2 cents, the Cummins amendment provides 15.78 per cent, and the House provides 20 per cent.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHAMBERLAIN in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMOOT. Gladly.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Utah will not fail to notice that the classification in the amendment that I have proposed is not the same as that in the act of 1909. The structural iron and steel in my amendment are not divided according to value.

Mr. SMOOT. I was going to call attention to that.

Mr. CUMMINS. And therefore the conclusion that the Senator draws based upon imports could not be at all accurate.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I was going to call attention to the fact that in the Senator's amendment the value above 2 cents and not above 3 cents per pound and the value over 3 cents per pound is 15 per cent, instead of 15.78 per cent.

On the next item, circular saw plates, the Cummins amendment provides for an equivalent ad valorem duty of 4.23 per cent, whereas the House bill provides 15 per cent.

The next item is anchors or parts of anchors, on which the Cummins amendment imposes an equivalent ad valorem duty of 11.98 per cent, while the House bill provides 15 per cent.

Take the total of the ad valorem duty on hoop, band, or scroll iron or steel and the total equivalent ad valorem duty in the Cummins amendment is 11.81 per cent and in the House bill 15 per cent.

On sheets of iron or steel polished, planished, or glanced, the Cummins amendment provides an equivalent ad valorem duty of 15 per cent and the House bill 20 per cent.

On bands and strips—that is, cold rolled and not polished—the Cummins amendment provides for an equivalent ad valorem duty of 2.59 per cent and the House bill 20 per cent.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SMOOT. Gladly.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Utah is discussing the fact that the House bill carries higher duties upon certain bulky and heavy articles of iron and steel than the amendment of the Senator from Iowa. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Utah that the Senator from Iowa, in framing his amendment, sought in fixing the duties, I imagine, to cover what he regarded as the difference between the cost of production here and abroad, applying as best he could the Republican platform adopted at Chicago with respect to duties. The Democrats do not believe there is any difference in the cost of production here and abroad on these heavier forms of steel and iron; on the contrary, they believe these heavier products are very often produced cheaper here than they are abroad. From their standpoint, there was no necessity of imposing a duty for the purpose of measuring the difference between the cost of production here and abroad. Under the Democratic theory of raising revenue to run the Government by customs duties, the Democrats were of the opinion, and they are still of the opinion, that there is no reason why the steel and iron industry of this country should not contribute its part toward maintaining the expenses of this Government. The duties fixed by the Democratic bill were based upon the idea of requiring this industry to contribute its reasonable share toward the expenses of the Government. Whether or not they have been successful, they have sought in fixing these duties to put them at a figure that would produce the greatest amount of revenue.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I simply want to renew at this time a statement that I have more than once made in the discussion of the general subject. First, I premise that there are certain duties in my amendment which unquestionably are lower than the duties prescribed in the House bill; but there is nothing more inaccurate, nothing more misleading than to attempt to convert specific duties into ad valorems upon the basis of the imports in the past where the paragraph which is the basis of the computation comprises a wide range of articles. Take the paragraph to which the Senator has just referred; it covers probably a hundred different classes of articles, and when you take the imports under that paragraph you have not separated them into their various parts and ascertained what particular kind of commodity has been imported. The customhouse or the Treasury Department simply collects all the imports under the paragraph and the value of the imports as given under the paragraph; and that is the way in which you compare the specific duty with the ad valorem duty.

The Senator from Utah is not in the least to blame for this. It is a comparison that has been made a hundred times here; but I want simply to warn Senators that it does not necessarily mean anything; it does not show exactly what the operation will be under the two schedules. I do not believe that anybody can convert specifics into ad valorems where the paragraph under consideration embraces a great number of articles having different values.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, answering the Senator from Iowa first, I will say that, if he will notice, nearly every item to which I have called attention has been specifically reported as to its value, as to the amount of each particular shipment corresponding to that value, and also the amount of duty collected and the rate of duty applied. Speaking of the last item to which I referred, strips and plates of iron or steel, there is only one duty upon them.

Mr. CUMMINS. I referred to the items of hoop iron and band iron.

Mr. SMOOT. And circular saws?

Mr. CUMMINS. And things of that kind. That was the particular paragraph I had in mind when I made the remark.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator said the last paragraph.

Mr. CUMMINS. I should like to ask the Senator, while I am on my feet, where he got his information with regard to imports under these various paragraphs and the duties paid upon them

Mr. SMOOT. I got them from the reports of the Treasury Department.

Mr. CUMMINS. Where are they? In what form are they? I have never seen any such report in which there has been any careful or logical separation of the various articles imported.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I thought I had the report from the Treasury Department here.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator from Utah will find he is not altogether mistaken, but somewhat in error when he says that he can divide these things into their component parts.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no question about it in my mind. I have studied the reports of the Treasury Department day after day and night after night, and there is no doubt, for instance, in the case of this report which shows that of steel circular saw plates valued above 4 cents and not above 7 cents per pound there was imported 332,549.50 pounds, their value being $20,432.50 and the value per unit of quantity being 6.1 cents. The duty under the present law is $1\frac{6}{10}$ cents per pound.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator has simply taken that from the report of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, as found in the tables which accompany the House bill. That is the information upon which the Senator has made his statement.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; but I will guarantee, Mr. President, that the Senator can call upon the Treasury Department for the reports, or, if I had my papers here, I could take every paragraph under any schedule of the tariff act and for every year show the total amount of importations, the quantity, the value per unit, and the amount of duty collected.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it may be that the Senator from Utah can get that information; I have not tried to get it at this session, but in two separate years I did try to get that information and was advised that it was not accessible; that is, the Treasury Department itself did not have any such information and did not keep the books so that it could be known.

However, before I sit down—for I do not intend to further interrupt the Senator in this part of his speech—I will say that the duties proposed in my amendment have not been fixed with any reference to the imports, save occasionally. I have gone to the imports to ascertain what general proportion of the business has been done abroad, as compared with the business at home, in order to correct what might be a false conclusion reached from other calculations. The duties in my amendment have been ascertained solely with reference to the cost of production here and abroad in view.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I understand the theory upon which the Senator from Iowa has framed his amendment, even if he had not just stated it, because upon the floor of the Senate many times and in private conversation I have heard him state that the duties imposed in his amendment were the duties which he thought measured the difference between the cost of production in this country and abroad.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely.

Mr. SMOOT. I believe that the Senator in fixing the rates in his amendment has fixed them upon the information he considered the most reliable.

Now, answering the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. Simmons), I believe that he has also stated correctly the position of the Democratic party in making a tariff bill. But I want to call his attention to the fact that in making this tariff bill on that basis the party has protected and more than protected the Steel Trust in many of its products and failed to protect the American manufacturer on most of the highly finished goods.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator from Utah permit me for a moment? I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator. He says the duties fixed by the House protect and amply protect the steel industry.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Steel Trust.

Mr. SMOOT. I say in some items it does; in some items it does not.

Mr. SIMMONS. I would be glad if the Senator would specify those items, and tell us whether he is in favor of and will vote for the reduction which the House bill makes.

I assume that the Senator will answer that he will, because the Senator has said that the rate fixed by the House afforded ample protection, and as he does not want more than ample protection he would be willing to vote for it.

Mr. SMOOT. In many items I would gladly vote to reduce the rate fixed by the House. Take, for instance, ferromanganese, which is manufactured only by the Steel Trust. There is not another concern in the United States that manufactures a pound of it. Under the present law the equivalent ad valorem duty is only 6.5 cents, and the Democratic party has imposed a duty of 15 per cent, and I might as well say now that this solicitude for the trusts on the part of the Democratic Party does not apply only to this schedule.

Take the chemical bill: We find the Democratic House took particular pains to select from a paragraph of the present tariff bone black and place it on the free list, although it has carried a duty for years past. Who are the principal users of bone black? The sugar refineries of this country and the greatest of all, the Sugar Trust.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course, there can be no doubt in the world about the fact that the Democratic Party is peculiarly the friend of the trusts, and there can be no sort of doubt about the sincerity and earnestness with which the Senator from Utah really believes that!

But, to come back to our mutton, where he and the Senator from Iowa were, I want to ask the Senator from Utah if the variation of values in steel circular plates is not between 4 and 7 cents, and if under the law of 1909 the duties were not $1\frac{9}{20}$ cents per pound. I want to ask the Senator from Utah how he could possibly arrive at the equivalent ad valorem of $1\frac{9}{20}$ cents a pound upon a product varying in price from 4 to 7 cents a pound, unless he could at the same time tell precisely how much of the 4 cents per pound, how much of the 5 cents per pound, how much of the 6 cents per pound, and how much of the 7 cents per pound product were actually imported. In other words $1\frac{9}{20}$ cents per pound, as applied to a product worth 4 cents, would be within a shade of 50 per cent ad valorem, whereas upon that part of it worth 7 cents it would be within a shade of one-half as much. I notice the next grade under the same schedule varies in price from 7 to 10 cents, and the next one from 7 to 13 cents. In other words, when he comes to convert a specific duty into an ad valorem—let us take 1 cent as an illustration. Suppose that that specific duty of 1 cent was paid upon a 4 cents per pound valued product. That would be precisely 25 per cent, would it not? Suppose it were paid upon an 8 cents product. It would be precisely $12\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, would it not? Suppose part of what was imported was the 4 cents product and part of it the 8 cents product and all conglomerated, how could the Senator say that his deduction to an ad valorem equivalent is at all accurate?

Mr. SMOOT. That could not be accomplished if we did not know what the amount of the duty collected was. But in every shipment is given the amount of duty collected, the number of pounds and the value per pound, and this being so, the equivalent ad valorem for every shipment is easily ascertained in any particular paragraph.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What does the Senator from Utah say is the ad valorem equivalent of $1\frac{9}{20}$ cents per pound specific duty under this heading "Steel circular saw plates" above 4 cents and not above 7 cents per pound.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not the figures before me to tell exactly what the equivalent ad valorem is.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let us take the Cummins bill. What is the specific under the Cummins bill, or is it a specific duty?

Mr. SMOOT. The equivalent is 4.23 per cent.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the specific duty?

Mr. SMOOT. Seven-twentieths of 1 cent per pound.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Seven-twentieths of 1 cent?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now then what equivalent ad valorem do you make that amount to?

Mr. SMOOT. 4.23 per cent.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Under this heading "Steel circular saw plates."

Mr. SMOOT. The equivalent is for the whole paragraph.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh; then if the Senator will pardon me, it is worse than I thought. I thought he could come pretty near it if he undertook to make an equivalent between 4 and 7 cents, because the variation in price and therefore the variation in ad valorem there is only 75 per cent, but if he is undertaking to make the ad valorem equivalent on articles beginning at 4 cents in price and going up to 40 cents in price then it is clearly impossible.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator evidently thinks that the equivalent ad valorem is applied to the rate per pound. The equivalent ad valorem is applied to the amount that is collected on the shipment and the quantities of those shipments. That is how the equivalent ad valorem is arrived at.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But in calculating upon the basis of the quantity of shipments, how could you tell how much of it was 4 cents a pound, and how much of it was 32 cents a pound, and how much was 40 cents, and you can not indicate any ad valorem equivalent upon any specific article.

Mr. SMOOT. In answer to that I can say to the Senator that there were 332,549 pounds at the value of 4 cents and not above 7; that there were 436,411 pounds valued above 7 cents and not above 10 cents a pound; that there were 65,243 pounds valued at above 10 cents and not above 13 cents per pound; that there were 1,288 pounds valued at 16 cents and not above 24 cents per pound; that there were 537 pounds imported at a value above 24 cents and not above 32 cents per pound; that there were 622 pounds valued above 32 cents and not above 40 cents per pound; and that there were 125 pounds imported valued above 40 cents per pound.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand.

Mr. SMOOT. These are the quantities that are imported and for every importation the specific value of the shipment is known, and not only that the value must be known before the Government can collect its revenues. The revenue quantity and value being known, the equivalent ad valorem of the shipments can be easily ascertained.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But it is not upon the report of the shipment that the Senator has based his reduction to an equivalent his equivalent. It is upon the mass of all of these various articles. The Senator surely will admit that when you put a specific duty upon a given thing, upon all goods of a certain class, running from 4 cents a pound, let us say, to 32, just as an illustration, the ad valorem equivalent upon the 4 cents part of it is just eight times what it is upon the 32 cents part of it.

Mr. SMOOT. As far as concerns the comparisons, I want to say to the Senator that, even if his statement were correct, it would make no difference, because as far as this comparison is concerned the quantities of the shipments, the value of the same, and amount of duties collected on all the shipments are used in both cases.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Ah! With this difference, if the Senator will pardon me: When he puts a specific duty upon products of widely variant value, he has brought into operation the principle of taxing the cheaper part of the product at the highest ad valorem and the highest priced of the product at the lowest ad valorem, necessarily; whereas an ad valorem duty is of course in keeping with the value, whatever the value may be. It is a fixed percentage.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not intend to take up the proposition just made by the Senator from Mississippi. That involves the whole merit——

Mr. SMOOT. Of the two systems.

Mr. CUMMINS. Of the specific, as compared with the ad valorem system. But I do want to start with a full understanding with regard to the conversion of these specific duties into their equivalent ad valorem duties.

I have no confidence whatever either in the conclusion to be drawn from these comparisons or in the former tables of similar import. Take the very commodity the Senator from Utah is now discussing. It is a very simple one and will illustrate precisely what I mean—pig iron. Pig iron, if imported from England, will come in under a value of from $10 to $17 a ton. The Payne-Aldrich bill fixed a duty on pig iron of $2.50 per ton. The report of the Treasury will show the number of tons of pig iron imported, and the amount of duty collected upon those imports, which, of course, is simply reached by multiplying the number of tons by the amount of duty.

Anyone can see that it is wholly impossible for the Treasury Department or for a Senator to determine the equivalent ad valorem duty upon these imports, unless the Customs Department would keep the invoices showing the foreign value of each ton of pig iron. The Treasury Department does not do that, and it has no information of that sort; at least it so reports to me.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not want that statement to go uncontradicted.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator from Utah can produce that information he will have been able to get access to a source of knowledge that I have never been able to find, and I have industriously tried to find it, because I have known that a great many of these conversions from specific duties into ad valorem and contrary have not been accurate. I believe if you will turn to the report of the Treasury with regard to pig iron you will not be able to tell me, and you can not tell the Senate, the per ton foreign value of pig iron and the amount imported into this country from abroad.

Mr. SMOOT. There certainly must be a misapprehension on the part of the Senator from Mississippi, and also on the part of the Senator from Iowa, in this matter.

Referring to the steel circular-saw plates, now take this comparison and see how it is arrived at. It gives the amount of importations, it gives the value of the importations, and it gives the value per unit of the quantity.

Now there are seven brackets. If the Senator from Mississippi were correct, if you would add those seven values per unit together and divide them by seven that would be the average, would it not?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No. That would be the average percentage of that which constituted the total product. It would not be anything else.

Mr. CUMMINS. Allow me to ask who ascertained those units of value? That was done by a clerk of the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. SMOOT. No; these values are the amounts that were collected by this Government upon the imports, and I can show, as I said before, that the imports were reported by the Treasury Department. Now, I say that that does not give the average, nor in this calculation does it pretend to. You add the values of the units in quantities together and it would be $1.80⅛. Divided by 7 that would give about .26, but it is not 26 cents, because all of the different shipments, as to value, were not equal. But what does it give? It gives 8.3 cents, showing that every shipment was taken into consideration as to the quantity and the value of the shipment, and the equivalent ad valorem is based upon all the shipments and upon the prices paid for each of the shipments.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator from Utah explain what interest the Government of the United States has in the value of a shipment upon which it lays only a specific duty ascertained by weight or measure?

Mr. SMOOT. They have the same interest in that that they have in the gathering of statistics on any subject affecting the United States. Take, for instance, any kind of statistics as to the amount of manufacture, as to importations, and as to exportations. What interest, I may ask the Senator, has the United States in finding or keeping track of exportations from this country?

Mr. CUMMINS. It does not keep the track of them in the sense named by the Senator from Utah. If we export pig iron, confining ourselves now to the first subject under consideration, the Government does not ascertain whether that pig iron is worth $8 a ton or $9 a ton or $10 a ton.

Mr. SMOOT. Not as to exportations.

Mr. CUMMINS. Nor as to imports.

Mr. SMOOT. But they do ascertain the number of pounds that are exported.

Mr. CUMMINS. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SMOOT. And they do ascertain the number of pounds that are imported and the value of those importations, and whether the article be free or whether it be dutiable.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator from Utah is right with respect to this, it is the most gratifying information that has come to me, and I believe will be the most useful information that can come to the Senate. If the Senator from Utah, as respects the metal schedule, will secure from the Treasury Department a table which will show precisely what has been imported and the value of each shipment that has come into this country within the last two years, I will be his debtor for all time to come. I have never been able to get any such information as that, and I would like very much to have it laid before the Senate and the country. Will the Senator from Utah agree to do what he can before this debate shall close upon the metal schedule to put that information before the Senate of the United States?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have only to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that when the tariff was under discussion in 1909 the Ways and Means Committee had a book, I suppose of 2,000 pages, although I am not positive as to that, showing the importations under every schedule, the value, the rate of duty, the amount of duty collected. I remember very well that the Treasury Department was asked to furnish the committee with the amount and value of shipments on many items as they arrived, and this was after the House had passed the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. And I will say to the Senator that I have no doubt but what I can get from the Treasury Department the daily statement showing the amount of importations, their value, the amount of duty collected, as well as showing the amount of exportations from this country of every item mentioned in the schedules of the tariff law.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is no difficulty whatever about getting the information with regard to exportations not as to value, but as to amount and measurement. The book to which the Senator from Utah refers, and that was commonly used in the debate of 1909, does not furnish the information that I have in view, and the table that has been prepared by the Ways and Means Committee of the House does not furnish the information. I have never seen any publication, I have never heard of any publication, that did furnish it. Now, I will be glad if the Senator will get it. I want him to understand just what I want, because I think it will be very illuminating if we could once get it. Referring again to pig iron, I want to discover just how much pig iron came in here that was worth $10 a ton; just how much came in that was worth $10.50 per ton and $11 per ton, and $12, and $14, and so on.

I do not want to duplicate the information we already have. We already have the bracket information to which the Senator from Utah refers, but that does not help us to turn specific duties into ad valorem duties. We can not do it accurately unless we have each individual shipment and the value of that shipment abroad.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, if the Senator from Utah will yield for a minute; as long as this subject has been introduced into the debate, I wish to state that I agree with the Senator from Iowa in what he says in regard to getting very detailed information in reference to the shipments. The most puzzling thing that confronts anyone in studying these tariff figures is the bunching of a number of items under one heading, so that it is impossible to distinguish what figures apply to each distinct article that comes under that group.

I think no greater improvement could be made in future tariffs, if the time ever comes when it is possible to make tariffs of any kind, than to provide that the report of the Treasury Department in regard to imports shall be given in much greater detail than it is at the present time. It is not necessary, as the Senator from Iowa says, that each shipment shall be given, but that at least articles of similar kinds shall be in some way grouped together, so that when we come to study the imports we can find out what figures to apply to the articles of each kind.

Mr. SMOOT. I will simply say again, Mr. President, that when the tariff was under discussion in the year 1909 I do not believe there was a day that I did not ask for certain information as to the importations in this country of the different items under the schedule that I was then considering, and I had them furnish me the information up to within 15 days of the time asked for, showing the amount of the importation, the value per unit, the amount of duty collected, and the equivalent ad valorem of the same.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ought to say that I do not want anything I have suggested here to be construed into a criticism of the Treasury Department. I think it very gladly and very expeditiously furnishes all the information it has. I do not think it has the information to which I have referred; at least I have been so informed more than once.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, referring to the statement of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], I understood him to say, in describing the principle which governed the Democratic Party in fixing the tariff rates, that they had no regard to protection, and in fixing some of the duties they had actually placed them higher that the difference in the cost of production between this and the competing country.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan misunderstood me. I said that the Senator from Iowa in arriving at the rate fixed in his bill was governed by the application of the theory of the Republican platform as to the difference between the cost of production here and abroad. I stated that the Democratic Party recognized, in fixing tariff rates, no such principle as that; that we propose to levy rates for the purpose of obtaining revenue to pay the expenses of the Government.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I supposed I had so put my question to the Senator. That is what I intended to do. The Senator further stated that some of the duties fixed in this bill by the Democratic Party are higher than the difference in the cost of the product.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I did not. I said some of them were higher than the rates in the bill prepared and introduced by the Senator from Iowa, and that if his bill measures the difference between the cost of labor here and abroad accurately, then the rates in the House bill on a few of the heavier articles would be a little higher than the difference between the cost. That is what I said, Mr. President. And the Senator must not forget that part of my statement in which I said that we levy duties for the purpose of raising revenue and for that purpose we fix the rate at the highest point where it will, in our judgment, yield the largest amount of revenue.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Let me put it another way, then. If it be true that the Senator from Iowa has fixed the duties equal to the difference in the cost of production and the House bill raises those rates, then in the House bill in certain instances the rate is higher than the difference in the cost of the product.

Mr. SIMMONS. That would undoubtedly be true as to a few of the heavier articles if the rates provided in the bill of the Senator from Iowa accurately measures this difference.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Then the Senator from North Carolina further stated that the reason why that was done was to enable these manufacturers to pay a part of the expenses of the Government.

Mr. SIMMONS. I said, Mr. President, that there was no reason why the steel and iron industry in this country should not contribute toward the expenses of maintaining the Government, and that in levying duties for the purpose of raising revenue to support the Government I knew no reason why they should be exempt from the application of that rule.

Mr. TOWNSEND. If the duty in the House bill should be higher than the difference in the cost of production, can the Senator from North Carolina tell me how under such a duty the producer or manufacturer in this country would contribute to the expenses of the Government?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I used that term in the sense that here is a product produced in this country and in order to get revenue we levy a duty upon that product. It may be that the consumer of that product would be the one who would pay the amount of duty, but the consumer of iron and steel in this country is not entitled to exemption from contribution toward the payment of the expenses of the Government.

Mr. SMOOT. Right in that connection, if the duty is higher than the present duty, and the present duty excludes importations, I should like to ask the Senator how the importations would get into the country to raise revenue with which to pay the expenses of the Government.

Mr. SIMMONS. What duty does the Senator refer to? I did not say higher than present law, but than the Cummins bill.

Mr. SMOOT. All duties mentioned; ferromanganese, for instance.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the only duty the Senator has referred to in this bill as being higher than in the Payne-Aldrich bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I can give others.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the only one the Senator has referred to up to this time.

Mr. SMOOT. It is the only one I have had a chance to refer to.

Mr. SIMMONS. I asked the Senator a little while ago, and he has not answered the question yet, if he would please specify the instances in this bill where we had raised the rate. He suggested a little while ago that we had used protective rates, and I asked him to please single out those instances and state to the Senate whether he would vote for those particular items in the bill. The Senator has referred only to ferromanganese, and he refers to that because the tariff in the present bill is higher than the duty in the Payne-Aldrich bill. The Senator knows that result was accomplished by transferring ferromanganese from the metal schedule to the alloy schedule.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I do not.

Mr. SIMMONS. Ferromanganese is an alloy. It is a sort of medicine which is used in tempering steel and iron. The Democrats thought that that ought to be taken from the metal benefit of the manufacturers of iron and steel, and put in the alloy schedule along with affiliated articles.

That same thing happened when the Payne-Aldrich bill was schedule, where it has no place, at the instance of and for the under consideration. I do not know whether it has been brought to the attention of the Senate or not, but it is a fact that the House bill in 1909 placed ferromanganese in the alloy schedule exactly as the present bill places it in the alloy schedule. When that bill came into the Senate ferromanganese was taken out of the alloy schedule and put into the metal schedule, thereby increasing the rate of duty upon that article.

Now, Mr. President, the Senator says that the United States Steel Corporation does not import ferromanganese.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I did not say that, Mr. President.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is true, Mr. President.

Mr. SMOOT. No; it is not true.

Mr. SIMMONS. The United States Steel Corporation makes its own ferromanganese. It is the only concern in this country that does make ferromanganese, and it will not sell to the independents a single pound of its ferromanganese. So far as the United States Steel Corporation is concerned it is not affected in the slightest by any duty, however low or however high it may be, upon ferromanganese. It makes all its ferromanganese, and it does not sell its competitors any of that product.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator reports a bill carrying 15 per cent, and every independent manufacturer in this country will have to pay 15 per cent in order to obtain ferromanganese he is compelled to use in making steel and iron that goes in direct competition with the product made by the Steel Corporation.

Mr. SIMMONS. Ferromanganese brought in does not compete with any ferromanganese made in this country except that made by the Steel Corporation; and it does not compete with that, because the Steel Corporation makes all it consumes and will sell none to anybody else. We have fixed the duty upon a revenue-bearing basis.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator if the 15 per cent on ferromanganese does not increase the cost of steel to the independent manufacturers of this country?

Mr. SIMMONS. Not according to my theory. According to the Senator's theory, yes, but not according to my theory. The Senator's contention is that the manufacturers of this country shall have all their raw material free upon the idea that it increases the price of the product.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is absolutely wrong. I think he has heard me say time and time again that I am not one of those who believe in free raw material. I believe in a duty upon everything whether it is free raw material or whether it is a manufactured article if the free raw material is produced in this country.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator and his party entertained that idea in the bill which they framed in 1909. According to the importations of the last two years, nearly 75 per cent of the importations that came in in 1910 and 1911 were the raw material of the manufacturer, and only about 20 or 25 per cent of those things that your tariff law permitted to come in free are bought and consumed in the homes of the people.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator must remember that the products that were admitted into this country free were products that are not produced in this country. For instance, silk, indigo, tea, coffee, and hundreds of articles none of which we produce in this country.

But I notice that the House passed a chemical bill transferring article after article not produced in this country that have been upon the free list for years and placing them upon the dutiable list. We will discuss that question when we come to the chemical schedule, and I think the Senator will be one who will ask that those articles at least that are used in the South which are now upon the free list and made dutiable in the House bill be transferred from the dutiable list back to the free list.

Mr. President, I could go on and make comparisons of perhaps 20 or 30 other items, but I think that I have called attention to items sufficiently to show the Senate just what I stated in the beginning.

The Senator said that I had only mentioned ferromanganese as one item where the House bill rate is higher than in the present law. I have later in my speech and in regular order a number of inconsistencies to call the Senate's attention to in this bill, but while passing let me call attention to just one other item so that the Senator from North Carolina will not say I only mentioned ferromanganese, and then I will content myself with further references as I have already stated.

Mr. President, we notice in paragraph 12 of the House bill the following:

Wire rods—Rivet, screw, fence, and other iron or other steel wire rods, whether round, oval, flat, square, or in any other shape, and nail rods in coils and otherwise, 10 per cent ad valorem.

The equivalent ad valorem duty provided for in the Cummins bill is 2.49 per cent; in the House bill, 10 per cent; in the present law, 7.05 per cent.

Another very significant fact in relation to this schedule is that cotton-bale ties are made free and the same iron, if it is in rolls, uncut, unprepared for use, carries a duty.

So, Mr. President, I call attention of the Senate to these few comparisons and inconsistencies and proceed to another part of the discussion.

Freight rates cut a great figure in the cost of placing the manufactured article in the centers of trade, especially upon the heavy manufactures of steel and iron. In passing, I desire to call attention to transportation rates now in force, to show that the foreign manufacturer of Germany, Belgium, and England has a decided advantage in reaching the great centers of distribution for these manufactured products along the eastern and southern coasts of our country. The freight rates from Pittsburgh mills to the United States North Atlantic ports and the United States Pacific ports, as compared with foreign freight rates to the same ports are as follows:

On rails to North Atlantic ports, $2.60.

To Pacific coast ports——

Mr. SIMMONS. From what point?

Mr. SMOOT. From Pittsburgh mills. Then I want to compare the rates with the ocean rates to all of the United States North Atlantic ports, showing that in the delivery of many of the heavy steel products the foreigner has the advantage in our own markets and markets where there are millions of tons of steel used.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. Why should the manufacturer at Pittsburgh desire to ship steel rails to New York or to any part of the Pacific coast for domestic use?

Mr. SMOOT. Pittsburgh, I believe, to-day ships a great deal of her product to the eastern seaboard and especially to the southern seaboard.

Mr. CUMMINS. I agree to that. She ships a great deal there for export, but not for domestic use.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; for domestic use.

Mr. CUMMINS. Because domestic use would simply require the steel rails to be started back west again in order to reach the point at which they were to be laid.

Mr. SMOOT. That would be true if all the steel rails were used at western points.

Mr. CUMMINS. They are all used either west of the Atlantic Ocean or east of the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. SMOOT. That is absolutely true.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is all that I suggested.

Mr. SMOOT. New York is west of the Atlantic Ocean.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. OLIVER. I will say that while there are comparatively few steel rails shipped from Pittsburgh to eastern ports, because between Pittsburgh and the East there are a number of plants making rails, and the eastern railroads naturally take their supplies from those mills, the argument of the Senator from Utah will apply to a vast extent of steel products of which rails are only an example. For instance, I think the majority of iron products made in Pittsburgh to-day go east rather than west.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the advantages in transportation rates apply to all the heavier products, including rails, plates, structural steel of all kinds, bar iron, tin plate, sheet iron, plain wire, wire rods, nails, pig iron, billets——

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have not compared them, but I ask the Senator from Utah for information. Are the rates in the schedule before him different from the rate I presented the other day from the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. SMOOT. I have not compared them closely. I hardly think there will be any difference.

Mr. CUMMINS. There was no difference in the rate on steel rails from Pittsburgh to New York?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I think the Senator will——

Mr. CUMMINS. The rate I gave the other day was $2.60.

Mr. SMOOT. That is correct. And from the foreign mills to the United States at the same ports of entry it is $2.85, and from the foreign mills to the Pacific coast it is $7.50, while from the Pittsburgh mills to the Pacific coast it is $13.50. I admit that that is not a fair comparison, and I mention it incidentally to show that on account of the rates the Pacific coast is buying most of its structural steel, iron, and rails from foreign countries. I am not asking that there be a rate of duty imposed equalizing the freight rates and that will protect that particular part of the United States. I do not ask it, nor do I expect a Senator in this body to support such a proposition.

Mr. SIMMONS. Do I understand the Senator to say that the Pacific coast is now buying most of its iron product abroad?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I stated that the Pacific coast to-day is buying a great part of its structural steel and iron and steel rails from abroad.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I have not the figures with reference to the importations of structural iron, but I have figures I think reasonably accurate with reference to the importation of pig iron. Although we, in this country, are producing about 27,000,000 tons of pig iron a year, I do think they imported on the Pacific coast last year but 40,000 tons. Now, I should like to ask the Senator, as a matter of information before he leaves that subject, what does he claim are the importations of structural iron and steel and other iron products not manufactured on the Pacific coast?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have not the figures here; I can not tell exactly what they are; but the Senator from North Carolina was at the hearings and he must remember——

Mr. SIMMONS. I will ask the Senator, for in the hearings I heard no such statement as the one he has made.

Mr. SMOOT. That was testified to, and I do not think a Senator who has studied this question closely and knows where the importations come from will deny the fact.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator from Utah permit me to interrupt him further?

The VICE PRESIDENT. To whom does the Senator from Utah yield?

Mr. SMOOT. I will yield first to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not claimed to have studied the subject accurately and that was the reason I was asking the Senator from Utah the question for information. Now, I understand the Senator to say that he is speaking from the hearings before the Finance Committee. I do not remember that anybody stated before the Finance Committee that the bulk or any very considerable part of the iron and steel used upon the Pacific coast was brought from abroad. I did understand them to say that just after the earthquake which occurred there, when there was a very great demand, there was for a while a considerable amount of structural iron and steel imported.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, for the information of the Senator from North Carolina, I will say that I know personally that there is a great deal of structural iron and steel shipped into San Francisco from foreign countries.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SMOOT. In just a minute, if the Senator please.

In relation to pig iron, the statement was that there were only about 42,000 tons shipped to the Pacific coast. Where did it come from? China. Why was not there more than 42,000 tons imported? Because of the fact that the industries located there are not using more. China has the Pacific coast market for pig iron to-day, and I am of the opinion it will not be very long until she will take a portion of our eastern market as well. Mr. President, a Chinaman is paid about one-fifteenth as much in an iron mill in China for what an American can be hired for. The Chinaman can do just as much work at a blast furnace; he can handle just as many pounds; he can watch the mechanical work just as well as can an American laborer. Many scout the idea of the yellow peril. I look for the day to come, Mr. President, when there will not be a person in the United States who will not demand protection from a people whose standard of living is that of the Chinese.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. OLIVER. I will say that I think I can enlighten the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] as to the importations of structural steel, but not alone upon the Pacific coast, because I have not the importations segregated, but speaking from memory alone——

Mr. SIMMONS. I asked about the Pacific coast because we are discussing that branch of the subject.

Mr. OLIVER. If the Senator will allow me to proceed, I will proceed in my own way.

Mr. SIMMONS. I simply wanted to know if the Senator was going to be specific about the importations on the Pacific coast?

Mr. OLIVER. I ask the Senator not to interrupt me now, but to let me complete what I intend to say.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will not interrupt the Senator any further now, nor about anything else, if the Senator objects to interruptions.

Mr. OLIVER. The importations of structural steel in the year 1909—the last year of the Dingley law—amounted, as I remember, to about 8,000,000 pounds. The imports in the year ending July 1, 1911, amounted to something like 28,000,000 pounds. I do not know what part of that went to the Pacific coast or what portion of it went to other parts of the country, but I do know that the imports during the last year amounted to something like three or four times as much as the imports during the year immediately preceding the enactment of the Payne-Aldrich law.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, before the Senator from Pennsylvania sits down I should like to ask him a question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Mississippi for that purpose?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Would the Senator from Pennsylvania mind giving the exports of structural steel for those same years, putting them in parallel columns?

Mr. OLIVER. I have not the figures for the exports here, Mr. President, but I would be very glad to give them to the Senator, or to give him any other information for which he asks and which is in my possession.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. GORE. I should like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania if he stated that the importations of structural steel had been larger since the enactment of the Payne-Aldrich law than they were prior to the enactment of that measure?

Mr. OLIVER. They were several times larger.

Mr. GORE. Was not the duty on structural steel increased in that law?

Mr. OLIVER. The duty on structural steel was reduced by the Payne-Aldrich law.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. OLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. Is it not true that the duty on structural steel which was cut to certain lengths was made absolutely prohibitory, and that it was announced upon the floor of the Senate that that was the intention?

Mr. OLIVER. If any part of the duty was prohibitory some part of it was certainly not prohibitory, because the imports of structural steel as a class has largely increased.

Mr. BACON. But the Senator has not answered the question I asked him. The Senator went on to state what was the relative rate of duty under the different laws and said it had been reduced, and I asked him the question whether it were not true that the duty on structural steel cut to certain lengths, or cut to lengths with a view to assembling in a certain way, had not been made absolutely prohibitory, and if the statement was not made by the then Senator from Rhode Island that the intention of it was to make it prohibitory?

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, whatever is in the RECORD the Senator from Georgia can revert to in order to learn what he desires. I can not say what the then Senator from Rhode Island said, but I do know that the duty on structural steel not assembled or fitted was reduced in that law, I think, from four-tenths to three-tenths, though I am not quite certain of the figures, but as to steel assembled or fitted coming under what is known as the basket clause, how much of that has been imported I do not know, but I do know that on the structural steel provided for in paragraph 121 of the Payne-Aldrich bill the duty was reduced and that the imports of that steel were largely increased.

Mr. BACON. Well, Mr. President, the Senator still does not reply. I understood the Senator to say that he does not know what the then Senator from Rhode Island said; but is it or is it not a fact that the Senator does know that the duty upon the particular class of structural steel which has been mentioned as cut or assembled steel was very largely increased and that the avowed purpose of that increase was to make the duty prohibitory?

Mr. OLIVER. I can not say that, because I am not armed with the facts.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think I shall be able to answer the question of the Senator from Georgia so that the matter may be clearly understood.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. Prior to the passage of the Payne-Aldrich law the duty on all forms of structural steel was $10 per ton. The Payne-Aldrich law divided structural steel into three classifications. On the first, structural steel, neither punched, fitted, nor assembled, under a certain price, the duty is $6 a ton and under a certain other price the duty is $8 a ton. With respect to those two classifications the duty was reduced in the law of 1909. With respect to all other structural iron and steel, however, that which was punched, fitted, or assembled, the duty was made 45 per cent ad valorem. That meant an increase upon that form of the product of from $8 to $10 a ton. I think Senators who were were in 1909 will remember that very clearly, because we had an animated discussion with reference to it.

While I am on my feet may I ask the Senator from Utah a question?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am glad to hear the Senator say that he does not expect that we can levy duties on pig iron or any such material that will protect us against a disparity in freight rates charged by the railroad companies across the continent and charged by the steamship companies from Germany or England. I have no fear of China, because when China takes the United States with her pig iron she will have already taken Germany and Great Britain and their pig iron; but I want to remind the Senator from Utah—and I am sure he is just as much interested in this as I am—that there is an easy way to protect the Pacific coast from the inroads of any foreign country with regard to pig iron. Just north we have unlimited coal fields that are precisely as good as those in Pennsylvania, Ohio, or West Virginia; we have in California an abundance of iron deposits, and all we need is the fuel to convert that ore into all forms of iron and steel. Now, all that we have to do is to be little patriotic at this session and open up the coal fields in Alaska so that coke can be brought to California, in order to enable her to abundantly protect the Pacific coast with a reasonable duty upon these various iron and steel products.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in relation to structural steel, I will state that there were two brackets made in the law of 1909, or, in other words, values per pound, upon which the duty was levied. The first bracket included structural steel valued at nine-tenths of a cent per pound or less, and the other structural steel valued above nine-tenths of a cent per pound. Under the last bracket clause there were imported into this country during the fiscal year 1911, 24,605,085 pounds. That was a decided increase of the importations over those of any preceding year.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Was the duty increased under the last bracket?

Mr. SMOOT. No; the duties under those two brackets were decreased.

Mr. CUMMINS. I might say, Mr. President, that the first bracket was a pure pretense. There is no structural steel, and there was not at that time, that was worth as little as $18 a ton, for the ingot out of which it is rolled is worth $18 a ton. The bracket was put in there, as I always thought, simply to answer a demand for a reduction in duty without really accomplishing it. The other is an operative bracket, and it was a reduction of $2 per ton upon that kind of steel.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, the Senator does not mean to intimate by his statement that I was going to try to cover up anything in this matter, does he?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; not at all.

Mr. SMOOT. I was going to tell the Senate exactly what the importations were.

Mr. CUMMINS. It seems to me I remember the Senator from Utah admitted that on the floor of the Senate when I charged it in 1909.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I certainly told the Senate then that there was an increase on all structural steel not included in the two brackets as mentioned. No doubt of it, and the reason for it was that, under the ruling of the department, all fabricated steel came into this country under the rate intended for unfabricated steel. Window frames, doors, sash, and all steel products entering into the construction of a building were made in Germany, fitted together there, then taken apart and shipped to this country in the knockdown. On arrival they were put together and were then ready to be placed in the great buildings in this country. I know the Senator will remember the case that was referred to at the time the Payne bill was under discussion; I refer to the Singer Building in New York. It was frankly and freely admitted that upon that class of fabricated steel there was an increase of duty, but there was not an increase upon structural steel, such as girders and all kinds of channels, T's, and everything that goes toward making a great fire-proof structure.

Mr. BACON. Now, will the Senator kindly state——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator kindly state the product in this country of structural steel in the year when he says there were 24,000,000 pounds imported?

Mr. SMOOT. I have not those figures at hand.

Mr. BACON. The reason I ask is that I think when that amount is ascertained, while it sounds very large to talk about 24,000,000 pounds being imported, that was a very small fraction of the total number of tons produced in this country. Of course, structural iron and steel are very heavy compared with the weight of other articles in relation to value.

Mr. SMOOT. I will admit what the Senator says is absolutely true.

Mr. BACON. And, while the figures will show, I presume, that assembled structural steel was not imported at all under the prohibitory duty which the act of 1909 placed upon it, the structural steel of other kinds imported, while it sounds very large to talk about 24,000,000 pounds, was a small fraction, almost a negligible fraction, as compared with the total quantity of structural steel produced in this country.

Mr. SMOOT. But, Mr. President, under the 45 per cent duty, importations have not been excluded; they still come into this country.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have the figures here which the Senator said he did not have accessible. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] was correct a little while ago when he said that in 1910 about 24,000,000 pounds of structural iron and steel were imported. Twenty-four million pounds was the importation in that year. That is equivalent to a little over 11,000 tons, hardly enough to build one of the great skyscrapers of New York. The value of that——

Mr. OLIVER. The amount was a little over——

Mr. SIMMONS. I will not yield to the Senator for the present, but I will do so a little later.

The value of that importation in 1910 was $322,303. The amount of structural iron and steel produced in this county in that same year was 2,124,000 tons, valued at $65,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. That is right. I now have the figures.

Mr. SIMMONS. So that we imported last year about $323,000 worth of this material and we produced in this country during the same time $65,000,000 worth of this material, and the Senator is afraid that a slight reduction of this duty may result in the capture of the American market by the foreign producer!

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator, after I yielded to him——

Mr. SIMMONS. I beg the Senator's pardon; I did not mean to make a speech.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I do not object. I am glad to yield to any Senator. I have no desire to shut off debate, but what I was going to say was——

Mr. SIMMONS. One word more, if the Senator will allow me. I think I owe him an apology. Probably the reason I injected this little speech was because of the heat that had been injected by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have no objection whatever to the speech. The only thing that I object to is that the Senator imputes to me something that I have not claimed. Structural steel was brought into the discussion at this particular time not by me; I have not reached the rate on structural steel and did not mention it except in connection with the freight rate. This whole matter came up without any desire on my part to discuss the rate of duty imposed upon structural steel.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, a few moments ago there was considerable discussion between the Senator from Utah and the Senator from North Carolina as to the comparative amount of structural iron and steel used on the Pacific Coast. I want to insert right here the testimony of Mr. Pigott, or at least a few sentences of his testimony, which will explain that situation. Mr. Pigott is a manufacturer of structural iron and steel in Seattle, Portland, and San Francisco, and in the course of his testimony the following occurred:

Senator McCUMBER. Do you know, in the rebuilding of San Francisco and in the late very great building in Los Angeles, what proportion of this character of steel that was used there in their buildings came from Germany and what proportion of it came from your mills,

Mr. PIGOTT. About one-half. Our representatives at San Francisco and Seattle and different points on the Pacific coast, from the figures they have given us, indicate that even under the present tariff half of the bars that are used in San Francisco are imported.

Senator McCUMBER. How about Los Angeles; do you know about that?

Mr. PIGOTT. Exactly the same condition does not exist there—but to a more or less degree—from the fact that San Francisco, being a larger shipping town, has the advantage of numerous vessels plying in and out, and therefore more competition.

Senator McCUMBER. Then, under present conditions, in your field of consumption Germany, or Europe, comes in and takes one-half of the American trade?

Mr. PIGOTT. Yes, sir.

That shows that the American manufacturers in the West who compete on about the same freight rates are unable to secure more than one-half of the business at their very doors and in the places in which their factories are located.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not intend to discuss this matter from my point of view in the midst of the speech of the Senator from Utah; but I must remind the Senator from North Dakota of the fact that the iron industries on the Pacific coast have nothing but scrap iron and other light material to deal with——

Mr. McCUMBER. They have pig iron imported from China.

Mr. CUMMINS. Outside of a very little pig iron which they import from China, but very very little. So I do not think it is wonderful that they can not——

Mr. SMOOT. But that pig iron is imported at a very low rate.

Mr. CUMMINS. At a very low rate. But I do not think it is possible for them to take merely scrap iron, manufacture large products out of it, and compete with the world or their own country in products manufactured from pig iron. The only way in which we could protect those industries would be to levy a duty upon the product that would measure the difference between the freight rate from our eastern coast across the country and the freight rate from England, Germany, or France, across the ocean, to our western coast.

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, no, Mr. President.

Mr. CUMMINS. In order to do that we would have to multiply the present duties once or twice, and I do not think the Senator from North Dakota even hopes to be able to protect the western coast of our country until there is some way in which the production can be developed there, and their industries carried on substantially as are the industries in the eastern part of our country.

Mr. McCUMBER. No, Mr. President; no one would claim that, so long as we must pay from $7 to $9 per ton in freight from Pittsburgh to any one of the Pacific coast points of consumption. We should levy a tariff sufficient to allow Pittsburgh the western trade. No one will claim that; but when we can import pig iron, costing but $7.50 a ton in Hankow, and bring it at a very low freight over to San Francisco, Seattle, Tacoma, and Portland, we ought to give such protection as will enable those who import the iron from that cheap source of supply to compete against Germany and England for the trade right at the doors of their factories. That is all we claim.

Mr. CUMMINS. I agree, Mr. President, with the general conclusion that has been reached by the Senator from North Dakota. If our western coast could get the pig iron from China, which it can not, it would convert that pig iron into the steel products, if it had the fuel, which it has not, and compete with any country in the world with our present duty. The difficulty is, first, that China has not the pig iron to export, and the second difficulty is that our western people have not the coal with which to do business. I hope they very soon will have; and, as I suggested a few moments ago, if we adjourn this Congress without making some provision whereby the western coast can supply itself with the cheap and excellent coal lying in Alaska, we will fail in one of the great duties which is incumbent upon us.

Mr. SIMMONS and Mr. NEWLANDS addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. To whom does the Senator from Utah yield?

Mr. SMOOT. I will first yield to the Senator from North Carolina and then to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. SIMMONS. I simply wish to ask the Senator from Iowa a question. I desire to ask the Senator if he thinks that after the opening of the Panama Canal there will be any difficulty in the manufacturers of the Birmingham district competing on the Pacific coast in the heavier products of iron and steel?

Mr. CUMMINS. I suppose that when the Panama Canal is completed we may be able to get steel from New York or from Mobile to Seattle or San Francisco under a freight rate as low as obtains, and possibly a little lower than obtains, from Germany, France, or England to those places. That depends, too, upon our diligence at this session of Congress——

Mr. SMOOT. And the tolls charged.

Mr. CUMMINS. As to whether the railroads of the country will own the ships going through the Panama Canal or whether they will be independent instrumentalities.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, a few days ago, if the Senator will permit me a moment, my attention was called to the fact that at that very time a large steamer was being loaded at the Port of Wilmington in my State with steel rails manufactured in Birmingham and hauled across four States, to be exported and sold in Peru and Chile.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BACON in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator from Utah a few moments ago was explaining the duty imposed upon assembled structural steel; that form of steel which is cut and punched and ready to be put together in a building. I will ask him whether the duty on that class of steel, as I understand from the Senator, is to protect the structural iron workers in the building trades?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; those engaged in the fabrication of the structural steel. Just those engaged in the fabrication; not the structural steel itself.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes. Can the Senator inform me how many men are engaged in that industry in the United States?

Mr. SMOOT. That is, in the fabrication?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I could not say, but there are a great many thousands of men engaged in it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Could the Senator tell me how many men are employed in the entire steel industry?

Mr. SMOOT. I have it here, but I can not turn to it immediately. I intend to refer to it presently, but there are employed in the making of all the items covered by this schedule nearly a million and a half men.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And those men have votes, I presume?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; a great many of them have.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Of course, some of them are foreigners. If the Senator will permit me, I wish to call attention to one fact. I have been advocating for many years a sliding scale of reduction, with a brake, and I have had two purposes in view. One was to avoid unnecessarily imperiling the industries of the country, and the other was to avoid scaring away the voters from the Democratic ticket.

I observe that in this schedule we are affecting the interests of about a million and a half workers. The statement of statistical information regarding the iron and steel schedule furnished by the Finance Committee and lying on our desks informs us that the total steel products consumed in this country amount to about $1,722,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no; that is not correct.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is an error.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I have added the amounts here under the different paragraphs, and that is what it amounts to.

Mr. SMOOT. You have added it wrongly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. How much was it?

Mr. SMOOT. Between three and four billion dollars.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Very well. This is probably accounted for by the fact as that to certain classes of steel there are no statistics as to consumption here.

Mr. SIMMONS. As to that particular class, it is one billion and a half. The Senator from Nevada is correct.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I find the domestic consumption of all classes of steel is not stated here. Assuming that the total domestic consumption of steel products amounts to about three billion dollars, as the Senator from Utah says, it is evident we admit into this country foreign importations to the extent of only $51,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. That is, of a certain class.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Fifty-one million dollars these statistics show as a total.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the small part of it; that is the heavy manufactured steel, and not the importations of all of the higher finished products.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Then may I ask what is the value of the statistical table which is furnished to us?

Mr. SMOOT. The value of it is in just what it purports to be, and if the Senator will examine it carefully he will find that the tabulations there are correct as to the items that are mentioned.

Mr. NEWLANDS. But on page 15 I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that there is a recapitulation as to all classes of steel imports, and the value of the total dutiable imports for 1911 under the bill H. R. 18642 is given as $51,000,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is correct for a year.

Mr. NEWLANDS. For a year; $51,000,000 is a very small percentage of $3,000,000,000.

Now we will assume that the House bill goes into operation and it seeks to maintain a duty of only 22 per cent in place of the average present duty of 35 per cent and yet it is expected, from this table, to obtain just about the same revenue that we now secure.

Mr. SMOOT. That will require an additional——

Mr. NEWLANDS. That would mean that we would have to have importations of nearly $90,000,000 instead of importations amounting to $51,000,000, and it means that as to that extra $40,000,000 of steel products American workers are to be displaced and foreign workers substituted.

I want to know from my Democratic friends, who are eager to have not only immediate reductions, but very considerable reductions, what effect it will have upon the voters engaged in these industries to tell them that so large an amount of American labor is to be immediately displaced?

Now, recollect, that is only one of the industries, and yet the same reasoning applies to all. I believe we should do that which our platform calls for—that we should have a sliding scale with a brake; that brake so adjusted as not to permit a very large immediate increase of foreign importations; and that we should have regard to our platform, which has repeatedly declared that our reductions should be accomplished in such a way as not to imperil the interests of the American workingman or to seriously impair American industry.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire to reassure the Senator from Nevada that I sincerely hope that his party will not succeed in the coming campaign. Nevertheless I do not want its friends to be frightened to death. And therefore I beg to give him the assurance from a long study of this subject and great familiarity with the Democratic bill that there will be no more importations under the Democratic bill than there have been under the Republican bill. The duties are all prohibitive, practically, and therefore he need not fear that a single man will lose a day's work or that his wages will be diminished by a single dollar.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am very glad to receive that assurance from the Senator from Iowa, whose familiarity with the subject we all know. But I ask, then, the further question, whether, if the amount of importations is not to be increased and the amount of the duty is reduced one-third, we can expect the same revenue that we now receive, or whether that revenue will not be reduced from about $18,000,000 to $11,000,000 or $12,000,000?

Mr. CUMMINS. The revenues will undoubtedly be diminished to some extent, but I have not been concerned in that part of the subject. All that I want is that the domestic prices shall be reduced for the benefit and the relief of the people.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Let me state——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the Senator permit me just one moment to complete my statement? The Senator will permit me to state that the statistical table must then be incorrect, for, if under a tariff duty of 22 per cent, substituted by the House bill for the average present duty of 35 per cent, the revenue will be $17,000,000 as against the existing revenue of $18,000,000, as declared by this statistical table, the importations must increase to between eighty and ninety million dollars.

Mr. CUMMINS. Perhaps some political economist or statistician or politician—I do not know who—has estimated that by the pending bill imports will be increased from $50,000,000 to $70,000,000. I differ with that political economist or statistician. I do not think the imports will increase in that way.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Then if this does not increase the imports the revenue will be less than $12,000,000, and it is well for us to understand that as we go along, for that means a reduction of $6,000,000 in existing revenue.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say that I differ entirely with the Senator from Iowa, for I believe, if the Democratic bill passes, the importations not only will increase $25,000,000, as estimated by the Democratic House, but they will increase $100,000,000. I do not say that they will increase that amount upon the items affected by the amendments offered by the Senator from Iowa, but take the highly finished products, every rate is reduced by the Democratic bill, and the rates are cut until they will drive not a few hundred concerns into bankruptcy, but will close the doors of thousands of small mills in this country. I will predict that, and I believe it as positively as I believe the sun will rise to-morrow morning.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think I ought to have confined my statement to the heavier forms of iron and steel, because I do believe that the duties in the Democratic bill upon the heavier forms—better organized forms of manufacture—are too low.

Mr. SMOOT. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Of course, I regard the statement of the Senator from Utah as to the disastrous effects of this reduction as very much exaggerated.

Mr. SMOOT. That may be the Senator's opinion, but I have given him mine.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It is perfectly apparent, if we are to get the same revenue—$18,000,000—from steel that we have derived heretofore, that under this new duty we will have to make importations to the extent of about $80,000,000 instead of importations to the extent of $51,000,000, and that the labor producing that $30,000,000 worth in this country will be displaced.

I want to see this tariff reduced, and I want to see it materially reduced, and I want to see it reduced by the only party that is bent upon the reduction—the Democratic Party.

Mr. SMOOT. That will not be accomplished yet awhile.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I want to see that party come into full and complete power in order to make the reduction, and I do not want that party to make an announcement before election that will so alarm the men who are employed in these various industries, and whom we are told aggregate 1,500,000 in the steel industry alone, that they will cast their votes against the Democratic Party and deprive it of all opportunity for usefulness.

For this reason I wish to make a gradual approach toward the final reduction which ought to be accomplished, and I believe that a sliding reduction, with a percentage reduction each year extending over a period of 5 or 10 years, with a brake so adjusted, under a rule fixed by Congress, as to stay the reduction temporarily at least when a wave of foreign importation threatens to invade the country, will bring the result we seek to accomplish more satisfactorily than any other process.

I have been in Congress now for nearly 20 years, during which we have been talking about reductions of the tariff, without substantial result, whereas by a reduction of 5 per cent annually we can accomplish a reduction of 50 per cent of the tariff in 10 years, and by a reduction of 10 per cent annually we can accomplish a reduction of 50 per cent in the next 5 years, and we can provide such a brake in this reduction as to stay it when an invasion of foreign goods is imminent. I would rather undertake a gradual course of reduction under the rule laid down by the Democratic Party, with reference to a gradual reduction so accomplished as not to disturb this vast army of wage earners and not to seriously interfere with domestic industries, than I would any radical action now which might so scare the workers as to prevent the Democratic Party from coming into power. I am aware that the steel schedule is one of our most indefensible schedules, but the statistics before me have suggested these remarks, and I present them in the hope that the Democratic Party will handle this subject of tariff revision and reduction in such a gradual and progressive way as to invite confidence in its wisdom and constructive capacity.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not worried as to what is going to happen to the Democratic Party, nor do I care what one Democrat may think as to what will happen to it; and if I had full confidence in the fear expressed by the Senator from Nevada, that to pass this bill would destroy the party, I think the proper thing, perhaps, would be to assist its passage.

But, Mr. President, I want to say that in my estimate of the importations into this country if the Democratic bill became a law is not based entirely upon my knowledge of the business, but we had before the committee laboring men who had worked in mills in foreign countries, who knew conditions in foreign countries—knew them not from hearsay but from actual experience—and they testified to the fatal effect the rates provided for in the Democratic bill would have upon American mills were they put in force. My statement is based upon opinions of men who should know.

Now, Mr. President, when I was diverted——

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. Do I understand the Senator as saying that these laborers who had visited Europe and worked in the mills of Europe made the statement he has just quoted?

Mr. SMOOT. They did not visit Europe. They were born there. They were brought up in the mills in Europe. They knew just what they were paid per day in Europe, compared it with the wage received in this country for the same class of work, and they testified before the committee that if the rates as provided in the Democratic bill were put into force the manufacturers in this country would be ruined.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will permit me, my recollection is that the laborers who came before the committee and testified to having worked in Europe, or having been in Europe and acquired information, confined their statements to the difference between the wages per diem paid in the factories of Europe and in the factories of this country.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator certainly must not have been at all the hearings.

Mr. SIMMONS. They did not profess, as I understand, to be able to compare the entire cost of production here with the cost of production abroad, but based their statements upon the theory that a lower per diem wage was paid in the factories of Europe than was paid in the factories of America.

Mr. SMOOT. That is all I am basing my statement upon, and the items I am speaking of are items in the manufacture of which there is from 50 to 90 per cent labor. I am not speaking of pig iron. I am not speaking of steel rails. I am speaking of the highly finished products, and I say that the rates provided in the Democratic bill if put in force will drive American manufacturers of these articles out of business.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will permit me, what did Mr. Schwab say when he was testifying before the committee? He declared that the wage per diem in this country was about twice as high as it is in Europe.

Mr. SMOOT. He so stated.

Mr. SIMMONS. But this same man had testified only a short while before, in the steel investigation, that while the per diem wages in this country were twice as high as in Europe, the cost of producing the heavier forms of iron and steel there was about as high as it is here.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator that we do not have to take Mr. Schwab's word as to what the rate of wage is in this country and in Europe. I will take the report made by the British Board of Trade, appointed by the Parliament to gather statistics as to the wage paid in this country, in Italy, in Germany, in Austria, in France, as compared with the wage paid in England, and from it I can prove to the Senator that the wage paid in this country is more than double what it is in England.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will permit me, I have not disputed that the per diem was higher here than it is abroad. What I am contending for is while the per diem rate is a little higher in this country, the cost of the product is not measured by the per diem, and the cost of production in this country of the heavier products of steel is about the same as abroad.

Mr. SMOOT. I say again that a man who is laboring in Germany—or why should I say a man? Let me say a man or a woman laboring in Germany, making all kinds of chains, scissors, knives, and cutlery of all kinds can produce in these higher finished products just as many dozen in 24 hours as can be produced in this country. Men who have worked in both countries producing these goods so testified before the committee.

It is true, Mr. President, that a few short years ago the handling in great quantities of the ore and the pig iron and in the making of steel rails in this country was done in a way that it did not cost as much per ton or per unit as it did in a foreign country, but that condition does not exist to-day, and the testimony showed that this class of goods to-day is manufactured in foreign countries in the same way and with as improved machinery as in this country.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. GORE. John W. Gates testified before the Industrial Commission that the mills of the United States supplied 60 per cent of all the wire used in England. Now I would like to know how that could be done if the cost of production is greater here than there?

Mr. SMOOT. I am very tired, and I am not feeling very well, but I am going to cover that subject from A to Z. It is not a question of tariff; it is not altogether a question of what it costs to make an article. It is a question of keeping a company's mill running even if it gets cost for its product or even less. I have made goods, and in some cases made more than my regular trade demanded, and have shipped them to a market where they would not interfere with my regular market. I did not care so much about the price as I did to get rid of them, for if I could get cost out of them I was ahead. Why? Because the overhead expenses, the taxes, the insurance, the administration charges were the same whether I manufactured a million dollars' worth or whether I manufactured $500,000 worth. The extra quantity made cheapened the goods I sold to my regular trade, and gave the employees a chance to work every day in the year. This same thing is being done by many mills in this country. It costs just about as much to run 2,000 tons a day from blast furnaces as it does to run 500 tons a day.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. SHIVELY. The statement the Senator has just made is decidedly interesting, and ought to be illuminating on this question. The Senator says that what he has just stated is a part of his personal experience as a business man. The Senator states that he has manufactured goods; and do I understand that he stated that he sold them abroad?

Mr. SMOOT. No; not abroad.

Mr. SHIVELY. The surplus?

Mr. SMOOT. Not abroad.

Mr. SHIVELY. Where was the surplus market to which the Senator refers?

Mr. SMOOT. The surplus market we had was San Francisco and eastern points.

Mr. SHIVELY. That is to say, the Senator had a certain circle of regular customers or trade?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; in Chicago, New York, Baltimore, Cincinnati, and other large cities.

Mr. SHIVELY. And having supplied that at his price, he sold the surplus outside of that market at a lower price.

Mr. SMOOT. In some cases; in others it may have been a class of goods that were of such a style that the trade did not want them.

Mr. SHIVELY. The Senator is now speaking from personal experience. What class of goods was that? Give an instance of them.

Mr. SMOOT. I was speaking particularly of woolen goods.

Mr. SHIVELY. So you had one price in one part of the country for your regular trade, and another price for what you regarded as the surplus product of your mills?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I had one price for the goods that were demanded all over the United States, but if there was a surplus stock I had to get rid of, that there was no special demand for, I would not go into the regular market and offer that to the regular trade. I had to sell them somewhere, if at no more than cost and sometimes even less.

Mr. SHIVELY. What temptation was there to manufacture that class of goods in your mills?

Mr. SMOOT. The manufacturer makes mistakes the same as a merchant or the same as other people. The Senator must know that. The manufacturer may undertake to make a piece of goods from a particular sample, and for some unaccountable reason the colors do not blend and the goods are not salable. I have seen a slight difference in the shade of the threads used to form a pattern spoil the goods for the regular trade, and could only be sold as seconds.

Mr. SHIVELY. I did not understand, however, that the Senator was doing that. Those things were more or less accidental. He was not operating in that way in order to keep the mill running the whole year round, was he?

Mr. SMOOT. No, of course not; but when you talk about the exportation of manufactured steel and iron, I want to tell the Senator that in Germany the industry is under one head, one syndicate. All orders come through it and they make the local price. Every exportation is reported to this syndicate, and the amount of loss occasioned by any and all exportations is made up to the exporter and paid out of a fund collected by the syndicate. Germany wants to protect and does protect her local market. They are protected against all the world. Not only that, a syndicate in Germany seems to be a virtue, but we send men to jail in this country who would form one, and I am not complaining of that——

Mr. SHIVELY. Do you think it is right?

Mr. SMOOT. I am not complaining of that——

Mr. SHIVELY. Do you think it is right to send them to jail?

Mr. SMOOT. I approved the law. I am only calling attention to the fact that the men who manufacture these goods in this country have to meet conditions of that kind.

Mr. President, I will show by the report of Mr. Pepper, the gentleman the Senator from Iowa referred to so often, that these bounties, if you may call them such, have been paid to German manufacturers on exportations to foreign countries; sometimes as high as $7.80 per ton on finished products.

The American manufacturer is up against a bounty-paid competitor, paid by a country that not only protects her local market, but she has made up her mind that the German laborer shall make the goods for the world as far as possible, and they do not care what system is adopted to accomplish it.

Mr. SHIVELY. I presume the Senator has the statistics?

Mr. SMOOT. I have.

Mr. SHIVELY. What were the German exports of iron and steel and the manufactures of iron and steel for the last year?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not want to begin the discussion of that question now. I am tired. As I said in the beginning, I am not feeling well; I should like to continue at some other time.

Mr. SHIVELY. I, of course, do not want to take the Senator's time——

Mr. CUMMINS. I hope the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY] and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] will allow the bill to be laid aside temporarily. I am sure that the Senator from Utah is proceeding under considerable difficulty.

Mr. SMOOT. Before that is done, I should like to have inserted in the RECORD, so as to complete what I was discussing when interrupted, the freight rates upon the different items from the Pittsburgh mills to the United States North Atlantic ports and to the United States Pacific coast ports, and the rates from foreign mills to the United States North Atlantic ports and to the United States Pacific coast ports.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection it will be so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] seems to have not always remembered accurately everything that is in the testimony, and he seems to differ quite often with the Senator from Utah as to what the testimony shows. A short time ago, if I understood the Senator from North Carolina correctly, he stated that those who testified before the committee and who represented the labor side of the question did nothing more than give the comparative wages in the old countries and in this country, and they did not state what the effect would be upon them. I may have been in error, but that was my understanding.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to say that my statement was made from the testimony that I heard. I do not claim that I heard all the testimony, because I did not.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to call the Senator's attention to two paragraphs. One is from Mr. Durkee, who represents the laborers employed in the manufacture of cutlery. On page 576, in the resolution which he presented, he says:

> We would call attention to the fact that the present rate, as shown by the importations of the past year, is not too high.

The present rate is 45 per cent, and the reduction is to 25 per cent. He proceeds:

> And that any reduction in the rate would mean an increase in importation and a closing of the factories here or a reduction in wages to meet the lower prices.
> Being mindful of the hardships entailed on us and our families by previous tariff reductions, we would therefore earnestly request you to use your best efforts for the retention of the present duty.

Then, turning to the testimony of Charles J. Pilling, who also represents the laborers employed, he says, on page 579:

> The surgical-instrument industry of this country is one that has been worked up by skilled laborers, and nothing but skilled laborers. The cost of manufacturing surgical instruments is nearly all labor and very little material. If the duty is reduced, it will mean the destruction of the industry in which these laborers are engaged. Already, to-day, about 75 per cent of the surgical instruments used here are imported into this country at the 45 per cent rate, so we do not know where we would be at the proposed 25 per cent rate.

His reasons for opposing it are that the manufacturer would receive less, and his answer, which I think very apt, was as follows:

> Protecting the laborer, of course, does affect the manufacturer. The manufacturer can not get along without the laborer, and the laborer can not get along without the manufacturer.

There is testimony of the same character right along in the following pages. Those who are engaged as laborers, with the knowledge that in that particular industry, the manufacture of surgical instruments, for instance, a very high class of manufactures, about 75 per cent of the articles used here are imported under a 45 per cent duty, can see that a reduction to a 25 per cent duty, as it seems to me anyone else can see, might possibly take up the other 25 per cent of the consumption in the United States.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand the Senator to say that he was reading from the testimony of a factory laborer.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I can readily see that laboring men working in the factories in this country and also in the factories of foreign countries would be able to give some reliable testimony as to the difference in the wage scale per diem or per year here and abroad. I can not see that the testimony of a laborer in a factory as to the cost of production, as contradistinguished from the per diem cost of labor, would be of very great value.

I want to say to the Senator that in speaking a little while ago I was speaking with reference to a case of which I had recollection.

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly. I understood that.

Mr. SIMMONS. Some of the laboring people came before the committee probably when I was not present and their testimony escaped my attention, but my recollection was that the men who spoke purely as laborers, who had been abroad and who came back with a knowledge of the wages abroad as compared with the wages in this country, spoke in reference to the per diem wage or the per month wage or the per annum wage. For myself, I would not regard the testimony of a laborer in a factory upon the question of the total cost of production here and abroad as of very great value.

Mr. McCUMBER. Right there, Mr. President, let me suggest to the Senator that those representatives of the laborers in those factories have as clear and accurate and as close a technical education as any one else dealing with the subject. They make it their study, perhaps, more than any Senator does to know exactly what effect previous laws changing the duties have had upon the matter of importations and the effect of any duty upon those importations. I believe that we get just as accurate information from the intelligent men who represent the labor element in the manufactories as we will get from the manufacturers themselves.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no objection to that provided no one else is ready to go on this afternoon.

Mr. SMOOT. I have understood that no one else is ready.

Mr. SIMMONS. Otherwise I do not wish to have the unfinished business displaced by anything.

Mr. SMOOT. I understood that no one is ready to go on to-day, and an executive session, I understand, is desired.

Mr. SIMMONS. I make no objection under the circumstances, if no Senator indicates his purpose to go on.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BACON in the chair). Without objection, the unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understood the Senator from Utah to say that an executive session is desired.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I understand that an executive session is desired.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah informs me that he is not in robust health, and he would prefer to complete his argument on Monday rather than to-morrow. A large number of Senators, an unusual number of Senators, have made an appeal that we should adjourn over until Monday. Personally I have no preference in the matter, but in deference to the requests that have come to me from both sides of the Chamber, I thought I would make the motion, and the Senate could do with it as it pleased.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I hope that will not be done. I do not, of course, want to insist on the Senator from Utah going on to-morrow, but I think the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] will be ready to go on to-morrow. We are very anxious to facilitate action upon this bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am quite as anxious as anyone.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not any desire whatever that the bill shall go over until Monday on my account. I think I will be ready to go on to-morrow.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then I will not make the motion.

Mr. SMOOT. If there is any objection——

Mr. GALLINGER. There is objection.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I could not hear the suggestion of the Senator from North Carolina. Will he repeat it? I very much hope that the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire will be accepted by the Senate. There is some work some of us want to do which we find it pretty hard to do when we continue in session during every day of the week from 12 o'clock until 6 or 7, as we have been doing for the last few days. I really think that we will make progress if we adjourn, when we do adjourn, until Monday.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to say to the Senator from Iowa that I am not insisting upon a session to-morrow to press the Senator from Utah to speak.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand that.

Mr. SIMMONS. There are other Senators who, I am advised, will be ready to speak to-morrow.

Mr. SMOOT. I understood that the Senator did not mean to press me to speak to-morrow. I am perfectly aware of that. But, as far as I am personally concerned, I have no doubt that on to-morrow I will feel better than I feel to-day, and I will be perfectly willing to go on. The only question that arose was not with me but with others, and it was just as the Senator from Iowa states. I know, of course, that I shall have to work all day Sunday to get my mail answered. It has been piling up for the last week. But I am perfectly willing to have a session to-morrow.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to inquire of the Senator from New Hampshire if there is any possibility of an agreement to take a vote on a day certain?

Mr. LODGE. Not the slightest. I can answer the Senator that.

Mr. SIMMONS. If we can do that——

Mr. LODGE. There is not the slightest prospect of an agreement; that is, at present.

Mr. SIMMONS. Not the slightest prospect of an agreement?

Mr. SMOOT. Not at present—later; not at present.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It seems, then, that the only possible way by which we can secure a vote is to keep in session all the time possible.

Mr. LODGE. That it is perfectly easy to do, if you have a majority to do it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I had intended to make the motion out of deference, as I said before, to an unusual number of Senators on both sides of the Chamber, but I do not want to make it if the Senators in charge of the bill feel that Senators are ready to proceed to-morrow. I will be glad to have the Senator from North Carolina——

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I should like to ask a question suggested by the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts, and more particularly because of the words he used.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that it is impossible for the reporters to hear Senators.

Mr. STONE. I rather gathered from what he said that possibly it was not the intention on the other side to let us have a vote on this bill.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, not at all; I did not say that. I said there was no prospect of an agreement at present.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will venture——

Mr. LODGE. It is rather early to make an agreement. A great many of us desire to be heard on the bill. It is a measure too important to be hurried.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will venture to suggest to the Senator from Missouri I feel sure there will be no undue delay in the matter of agreeing to a vote. Certainly I want a vote on all these bills. But as long as Senators desire to discuss them of course we can not force a vote; it is impossible for us to do that.

Mr. STONE. We have been discussing this bill now for weeks.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no; there have been but two speeches made on it.

Mr. STONE. It has been before the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. It has been before the Senate, and there has been an appropriation bill up all the time. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] has made a speech, and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] has made a speech upon this bill. Those are all the speeches which have been made until to-day.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There was plenty of time for other Senators to have made speeches, if they had wanted to do so.

Mr. LODGE. I do not see the time. We have spent four days in the continuous discussion of the agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. STONE. Of course, if Senators on the other side do not want to let us vote on the bill, if that is really the policy of our friends on the other side, it will develop pretty soon, and we ought to begin to have that development now, so that we will have some idea as to what we are going to do. We are in a minority. We can not force the majority.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I understood from the statement of the Senator from North Carolina that it is probably the wish of the Senator from Missouri to go on with the discussion to-morrow.

Mr. STONE. I said that I could do so.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. If that is true or if there is any Senator upon the other side who desires to go on with the discussion, I do not believe we ought to adjourn over, because I think we ought to close this matter up as soon as we can. I know that I am right in assuring the Senator from Missouri that there is no desire to delay it, and if we can take it up and do anything with it to-morrow I am not in favor of adjourning over.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If no Senator is ready to go on with it, can we not go ahead with the reading of the bill?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I have no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Utah said he would be ready to go on to-morrow, and the Senator from Missouri is ready to follow him.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. If there is any Senator ready, I shall not be in favor of an adjournment over.

Mr. GALLINGER. Under the circumstances I will not make the motion to adjourn over. Some other Senator may make it if he chooses.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I want to say a word. We have been here continuously now for the past two weeks in close attendance on the sessions. A good many of us have gotten behind with our routine work and the time will not be lost, I feel satisfied, taking into consideration the time consumed in the consideration of this bill, if we would spend to-morrow otherwise; and in the end we will find we have made real progress.

I think the sentiment here on this side is that there should be an adjournment over. Of course I do not want to antagonize the wishes of any of our Members of this side, or the other side, for that matter, and any courtesy which usually prevails in the Senate will still prevail here. What I have to say is not in antagonism to it, but I give it as my opinion that we will make real progress by adjourning over to-morrow.

I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will not withdraw the motion, but will give the Senate an opportunity to express itself on the subject.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am sure no one would accuse me of any desire to delay the consideration of this bill or a vote upon it, but I think unless some Member of the Senate has made such arrangements as that it will be more convenient for him to speak to-morrow than upon any other day, we ought to adjourn until Monday. We have been here continuously now for a good many days, and our adjournments have been rather late in the afternoon. There is a great deal of work every Senator has to do that can not be done in the Senate Chamber. There are some of us, at least, who do not want to leave the Senate while it is in session.

I hope, therefore, that the Senator from New Hampshire will adhere to his motion, for I believe it will be and is the wish of a great majority here to adjourn until Monday.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, under the circumstances, in view of the appeal that has been made from both sides of the Chamber, I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire moves that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next. The Senator from Mississippi calls for the yeas and nays upon that motion. Is there a second? [After a pause.] The yeas and nays are not ordered.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, can we not have a division? I should like to have Senators stand up and be counted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As many as desire to sustain the call for the yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After a pause.] Five only have risen, which is not sufficient to sustain the call. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next at the usual hour.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 1 hour and 45 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

PRIVILEGES OF THE PRESS GALLERY.

Mr. HEYBURN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 314) for consideration:

Resolved, That any paper publishing the proceedings of an executive session of the Senate, or what purports to be the proceedings of an executive session, shall not be entitled to the privileges of the press gallery of the Senate; and that the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate be instructed to exclude from the press gallery any representative of any paper publishing such report who may be found therein.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 5 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, May 20, 1912, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 17, 1912.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our heavenly Father, help us to realize the great responsibility of life, for "it is the truth of God, working through the personality of man, which has been the salvation of the world." Inspire us to put our personality into our work on the side of right and truth and justice, that we may enhance the real values of life and thus increase our efficiency for good to the honor and glory of Thy holy name, in Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CONFERENCE REPORT—DAMS ACROSS THE SAVANNAH RIVER.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask the Speaker to lay before the House the conference report on the bill S. 5930. It will only take a moment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. 5930. An act to extend the time for the completion of dams across the Savannah River, by authority granted to the Twin City Power Co. by an act approved February 20, 1908.

Mr. MANN. I reserve a point of order.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois rise?

Mr. MANN. I desire to reserve a point of order upon the report, and I would like to ask the gentleman whether in making the report the conferees have not changed the text of the bill as it passed both Houses?

Mr. ADAMSON. Well, I do not think we have. In fact, there was a proviso added to the Senate bill. We struck out by amendment in effect the most substantial and only thing in that proviso applicable to this case. The conferees receded by taking out the entire proviso.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman did make a change. I do not know; I may make a point of order if I get a chance to examine it, but I would like to have a chance to examine it.

Mr. ADAMSON. I have no objection if the gentleman has not had time to examine it, and I will withhold the request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withholds the conference report.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move, then, in order to test the pleasure of the House about a matter I am not at all contrary about myself, that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 21969) known as the Panama Canal bill.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question. The gentleman is well aware that this day is set apart under the rules for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar. I would like to ask if he is not willing to yield to-day for the consideration of the Private Calendar. I will say to the gentleman that there are a large number of bills from the Committee on Claims, and the gentleman is well aware this session is drawing to a close, and while his motion, we all know, is a preferential motion, if the committees which have charge of these appropriation bills and bills like that of which the gentleman has charge now continue to insist upon displacing the Claims Committee, why all there is to it is that these matters will not have consideration during this session of Congress.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, while I am not aware, as the gentleman suggests, that the session is rapidly drawing to a close, I do hope and trust he is correct in his supposition to that effect. As to my willingness to withdraw this motion and yield to the Claims Committee, it is not a question of my personal pleasure. So far as I am concerned, I would yield anything personally to the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU]. I stated in making the motion that I simply wished to take the pleasure of the House. I will state, however, and it is no betrayal of secrets, that there was a kind of conference among a number of us the other day, looking to the very purpose that the gentleman suggests as to early adjournment, and those present thought if we could pass this canal bill and the appropriation bills, and get them over to the Senate, that pending the consideration of the conference reports there might be ample time to consider the matters that the gentleman from North Carolina refers to and many others.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 21969?

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. POU. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 28, noes 13.

So the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone, with Mr. LLOYD in the chair.

OPERATION OF PANAMA CANAL.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, the situation at present is that I am about three hours ahead in the distribution of time on this side of the aisle, and I will ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] to consume some time.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, how much time has the gentleman from Georgia taken?

The CHAIRMAN. Five hours and 27 minutes.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. How much time has been charged to me?

The CHAIRMAN. One hour.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I yield an hour to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH].

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] if he feels that is carrying out the agreement? There have been five hours in favor of the bill and two against. What is the object of the gentleman in exhausting all the time in favor of the bill and dividing up the last part of it?

Mr. MANN. The last two speeches were made on the gentleman's side.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Whatever has been charged to my side has been used by the gentleman from California [Mr. KNOWLAND]. I am willing to carry out the agreement, but necessarily prefer members of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] withhold his statement until the bill is reported? The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I do not understand that the time of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS] is charged up to the support of the bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. Oh, yes. Each side of the House has to divide between the two factions.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The time so yielded to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS] by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] at that time was used against the bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will keep the division straight between the gentleman from Michigan and myself.

Mr. FOSTER. What the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] is getting at is that all this 5 hours and 27 minutes has not been used by those who favor the bill entirely.

Mr. ADAMSON. I understand that. I am keeping account of that.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I think the situation is this: The agreement was that the time should be equally divided between those who signed the majority report and those who signed the minority views. The agreement with the chairman of the committee was that half of his time should be given to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and half of the time on this side be given to me. Now, there has been used up to this time 4 hours and 27 minutes by those in favor of the bill, but at least in opposition to one section there has been used but 1 hour and on the other side but 1 hour and 10 minutes, so that in reality this side has still 2 hours more, divided between the Democratic and Republican sides, before the majority should really get in again.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, the time can not be divided that way. As the Chair and the committee have noted, I have tried to keep my agreement faithfully. I yielded an hour to the gentleman from California, and I now yield an hour to the gentleman from Wisconsin, on the opposite side. The next hour will be controlled by the gentleman from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] and the next hour by myself, and the gentleman from Georgia will then deal out the time as agreed with his colleagues. I think that is in a spirit of utmost fairness. It gives them the same time as on the other side of the Chamber. On the other side I can not control the time. But I think the gentleman is doing the best he can under the circumstances.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Does the gentleman think this is in harmony with the agreement with those in favor of the bill who consumed so much time at first? Have you seen it done before on the floor of the House? I never have since I have been here.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], in charge of the bill, consumed 4 hours and 27 minutes nominally. A large share of that time was really consumed by gentleman opposed to the bill, because the gentleman from Georgia was in charge of the bill.

Mr. SIMS. Certainly it was.

Mr. ADAMSON. Two-thirds of my time was consumed in that way.

Mr. MANN. I do not see how the gentleman can complain.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Those who are in favor of the bill want to take the time first, and it ought to be divided up equally.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman's statement is a very unfair statement.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield an hour to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH]. The next hour will be controlled by the gentleman from California [Mr. KNOWLAND], who opposes a provision of the bill.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I shall not in this address devote much time to the contentious sections of the bill, namely, sections 5 and 11. I wish now to call attention to the larger aspects which this legislation presents, and to that end I wish to consider the effect of tolls on the world's traffic using the Panama Canal.

This legislation ought to have been passed a year ago. There is great need of its speedy enactment now. The chairman of the Isthmian Canal Commission ought to be given speedy authority to mould the present labor force on the Isthmus into the operating force which is to take charge of the work when the canal is opened to traffic. This authority should be given to him early, so that he can select out of the present labor force the most efficient men to constitute the permanent operating force.

Another reason for the speedy consideration of this legislation arises out of the fact that the shipping world is entitled to at least two years' notice as to the tolls and the regulations affecting traffic through the Panama route. We are advised that merchant ships will be able to pass through the canal by the latter part of 1913. There is therefore now barely time enough for the world's shipping to make contracts for the construction of new ships, the establishment of new lines, and complete trade arrangements. The Isthmian Canal Commission and the Secretary of War have been receiving urgent appeals to know what the tolls are to be on the Isthmus, so that the shipping lines can guide their course accordingly.

I stated that I wished to consider this matter in the wider and broader aspect—the relation of tolls to the world's traffic—and in considering this phase of it I wish to present a map on which are marked the routes of travel now carrying the majority of the world's commerce and the new routes which the Panama Canal will make available. There is no doubt in my mind but that the Panama route will secure a monopoly of the traffic on the west coast of both North and South America. The greatest fact connected with the canal is the shortening of distance and the lessening of time; and time and distance are the elements to-day which largely control the routes of ships. When it is realized that the construction of this canal will save the circumnavigation of South America in traffic between the North Atlantic and Pacific seaboards, its importance is at once realized; and when that saving is reduced to miles, and the amount is known to be about 8,000 miles, the monopoly of the Panama route as against any other competitive route also becomes readily apparent.

In order more clearly to realize the importance which the shortening of distance and of time will have on commerce it is necessary to reduce it to dollars and cents. That brings us to the consideration of the unit of toll charges at the canal. What shall that unit be? Vessels are measured by different systems. There is the displacement measurement, which represents the weight of water in tons which a vessel will displace when fully loaded and equipped and ready for sea. This is the system adopted by all maritime nations in the measurement of warships and is the system we will apply at the Isthmus of Panama.

There is the gross tonnage measurement of ships, which represents in cubical contents of 100 cubic feet per ton all the inclosed portions of a vessel. There is also the net tonnage measurement, which represents what is left of gross tonnage after there has been deducted the spaces for coal bunkers, engines, boilers, and shafting.

The net tonnage system of measurement is the one used by most nations in the fixing of tolls. It is the system applied at the Suez Canal, and as a result of the testimony presented before our committee by experts the committee feel inclined to favor the net-tonnage system as the basis for the measurement of tolls at the Isthmus.

Besides these several systems of measurement there is what is known as the weight or measurement tonnage, the weight tonnage representing the number of long tons which can be carried in the net tonage of a vessel; measurement tonnage being the amount of the cubical space expressed in tons, allowing 40 cubic feet to the ton.

The net-tonnage system is the one which concerns us in the administration of the Panama Canal, and it is the system which will be adopted there without doubt, although this bill gives the President the discretion of adopting gross or displacement tonnage, net tonnage, or any other form as, in his judgment, seems best. He also is given the discretion of using displacement tonnage in the measurement of war ships using the canal.

Having thus determined the unit of measurement for the tolls at the Isthmus, it will be necessary next to determine the cost of that unit per day for vessels at sea, in order to determine in dollars and cents the advantage in using the Panama route over any other competitive route.

Dr. Emory Johnson, the special commissioner on Panama traffic and tolls appointed by the President, than whom there is no more reliable expert, has made an exhaustive examination of this subject, and has consulted with shipowners and shipbuilders and has deduced this formula, that the cost per net register ton per day at sea is 10 cents for the average vessel of 10 knots per hour. He found that 10 knots, a knot being equal to 1¼ statute miles, was the most profitable speed of freight-going ships the world over. This unit cost embraces not only coal cost, cost of victualing the ship, and wages of the crew, but also the proportionate cost of interest, depreciation, maintenance, and insurance. In fact, he took into the calculation all possible elements of cost and deduced therefrom the formula of 10 cents per net registered ton per day at sea.

The testimony also shows that vessels which can most profitably use the canal will be vessels of 4,000 tons net register or more. Those of less tonnage can not use the canal to best advantage.

If then we take a vessel registering 4,000 net tons, the dues or tolls at the canal, if fixed at $1 per ton, will amount to $4,000, and her cost at sea per day $400. Having gotten some idea of the cost of the ship per day, and the cost of the tolls at the canal, we are more readily able to understand the advantage in dollars and cents resulting from the use of this canal as against competitive routes.

In this connection we can declare without fear of contradiction that $1 a net registered ton will give to the Panama route a monopoly of the traffic between our Atlantic and Gulf seaboard and the Pacific coast of North and South America and the Hawaiian Islands.

I wish to call attention to the further fact that the Panama route can not expect to receive any tonnage developing on the north coast of South America, and in fact but little developing on the entire east coast of South America. In other words, the great ports of Rio Janeiro, Montevideo, and Buenos Aires will have little or no use for the Panama route. The territory in South America which will be benefited by the canal is that narrow strip extending from Panama to the Straits of Magellan, a distance of 4,000 miles, and lying between the summit of the Andes and the Pacific Ocean, a strip small territorially, but extremely rich in minerals and other resources.

The Pacific coast of North America will use the Panama route for its commerce with the Atlantic and Gulf seaboard. At present the Tehuantepec route, crossing Mexico, is a rival of the Panama Railroad; but that rivalry will cease upon the opening of the Panama Canal. It now costs $3.50 per cargo ton to cross the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, which will amount to about $7 per net registered ton. The Tehuantepec Railroad gets one-third of the through rate. Therefore the rate at Tehuantepec being $7 per net registered ton, as compared with $1 per net registered ton at Panama, the difference in favor of Panama will be $6 per net registered ton. There can be consequently no competition between the Panama Canal and the Tehuantepec Railroad route. The extremely large percentage of wastage and breakage resulting from twice breaking bulk still further handicaps the Tehuantepec route.

I have here Table I, prepared by Dr. Johnson, showing distances and time saved via the Panama Canal as compared with the Straits of Magellan between the Atlantic-Gulf ports of the United States and the west coast of South America.

TABLE I.—Distances and time saved via the Panama Canal as compared with the Strait of Magellan between the Atlantic-Gulf ports of the United States and the west coast of South America.

Coronel	3,296	14.7	13.2	10.9	9.3	8.1	4,291	19.4	17.4	14.4	12.3	10.7

A vessel from New York to Callao, on the west coast of South America, would save 6,250 miles as against the Strait of Magellan route. In days saved this would represent 28.4 days for a vessel traveling 9 knots per hour, 25.2 days for a vessel traveling 10 knots, and 15.7 days for a vessel traveling 16 knots. Fourteen and sixteen knot vessels are, as a rule, passenger steamers, and these will not to any large extent in the early years of the Panama route use that route. As the per diem cost of such steamers is much higher than that of the freight steamers, it will take a less number of days saved at sea to pay the canal tolls; hence in time we may expect fast vessels to use the canal.

If it costs a 4,000-net-register-tonnage ship $400 per day, then 10 days saved in sailing time would equal $4,000, or the amount of tolls the ship would have to pay. A vessel from New York to Callao, which is 6,250 miles nearer New York by the Panama route than by the Strait of Magellan, saving 25.2 days if a 10-knot vessel, would have an advantage of 15.2 days by way of profit by reason of the use of the Panama route, or over $6,000.

The next port south of Callao of importance is Iquique, 5,239 miles near New York by way of the Panama route than by way of the Strait of Magellan, representing a saving of 23.3 days for a 9-knot ship and 20.9 for a 10-knot ship. This port of Iquique is important, because it is the great nitrate port of South America; near by and within easy reach of tidewater are the great nitrate fields of northern Chile.

Last year 2,500,000 tons of nitrates were shipped from this port, 500,000 tons coming to the United States to be made into fertilizer and 2,000,000 tons being sent to Europe. These 2,500,000 tons of nitrates required in their shipment a vessel capacity of 1,000,000 net registered tons. At $1 a ton the export of nitrates alone through the Panama Canal would have developed a revenue of $1,000,000.

To Valparaiso, the great port of the west coast of South America, the distance saved via the Panama route over the Magellan route would be 3,747 miles, representing a saving of 16.8 days for a 9-knot ship and 15.1 days for a 10-knot ship.

Coronel, the southernmost port in Chile, except Punta Arenas, 400 miles south of Valparaiso and about 1,000 miles north of Magellan, is important because it is the only port on the west coast of South America where native coal can be secured. I hope, if I have time, to discuss the importance of coal and coal costs as affecting the traffic that can use the Panama route.

If Table I be examined, it will be found that New Orleans is nearer these South American ports on the west coast via the Panama Canal than from New York by about 1,000 miles, giving to New Orleans and other Gulf cities just that much advantage in the saving of time and distance.

Remembering that 10 days saved in sailing time will equal or make good the canal tolls with a 10-knot ship, every one of these South American ports to which I have referred can profitably use the Panama route as against the route through the Strait of Magellan.

I wish next to direct your attention to Table II:

The distances are longer than between the Atlantic and Gulf seaboard and this west coast, and the savings in days are less, but the demonstration of advantage in favor of the Panama route is almost as conclusive. For instance, from Liverpool to Callao—Liverpool, representing a typical port of England, is nearer to Callao by way of the Panama route than by way of the Strait of Magellan by 4,043 miles, representing a saving of 18 days for a 9-knot ship, 16.3 days for a 10-knot ship, and exactly 10 days for a 16-knot ship, while Iquique, the great nitrate port, is nearer by 2,932 miles, representing a saving of 13.1 days for a 9-knot ship and 11.7 days for a 10-knot ship.

Valparaiso, the objective port for most of the west South American trade, will be nearer to Liverpool by way of Panama than by way of the Strait of Magellan by 1,540 miles, representing a saving of 6½ days for a 9-knot ship and 5.9 days for a 10-knot ship. You will notice, therefore, that as to Valparaiso there is a saving in time of less than 10 days, practically only 6 days, representing $2,400 in money equivalent. But as the canal tolls on our typical ship of 4,000 tons net register would be $4,000, there would be a handicap of $1,600 against the ship using the Panama route. The question is, Would that ship go through the Panama Canal instead of going to Liverpool by way of the Strait of Magellan?

I believe, and the experts declare, that the Panama route will be preferred for the following consideration: The Strait of Magellan is over 200 miles long. The shores are rocky and precipitous and there are few aids to navigation. In the winter time floating ice abounds and there are dangerous cross currents. It is a dangerous passage at any time. The rate of marine insurance on vessels from Europe to the west coast of South America is higher through the straits than it would be through the Panama Canal. It is impossible now to give the amount of this difference, but it will be appreciable. Whatever it will be, it ought to be deducted from the $1,600 handicap on the vessel that uses the Panama route. Again, a vessel leaving Liverpool or Antwerp or Gibraltar for Valparaiso by way of the east coast of South America would have few ports of call, and would, therefore, have less opportunities for taking on or discharging cargo, whereas if it took the Panama route it would have ports like Guayaquil, Callao, Iquique, Valparaiso, Coronel, and even Punta Arenas on the Strait of Magellan.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Certainly.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. The gentleman concludes, I take it, that practically all the traffic with western South America and northern ports would pass through the Panama Canal.

Mr. ESCH. What does the gentleman mean by northern ports?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I mean Atlantic and Gulf as well as European ports.

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. What sum does the gentleman consider, figured in net registered tonnage, might reasonably be expected in the first year?

Mr. ESCH. In 1910 the foreign commerce of the west coast of South America with Europe amounted to 3,128,000 net registered tons, and it is safe to assume that that entire tonnage would use the Panama route, thus developing a revenue of $3,128,000. Another advantage in using the Panama route between Europe and Valparaiso or return is the fact that coal can be gotten cheaper than by way of the east coast of South America and through the Strait of Magellan. In fact, from the figures that are given the saving in coal alone by the use of the Panama route might be enough to pay the canal tolls. On this account we conclude that the Panama Canal, with a rate of $1 per net registered ton, will secure practically all of the traffic developing along the west coast of South America with Europe, barring possibly a portion from Coronel down to the straits. It is easy to conceive that if a vessel at Valparaiso can secure a full cargo it might go home by way of the Strait of Magellan, or if it could secure part or full cargo at Montevideo, Buenos Aires, or Rio de Janeiro for Europe. Another fact to be considered is this: Passenger traffic with Valparaiso from Europe might go down the Atlantic coast to Buenos Aires and then go over the trans-Andean railroad, which has been opened within the year, to Valparaiso and Santiago, but the cost for railroad fare from Buenos Aires to Valparaiso would be so great as to make this route practically prohibitive for all save emergency traffic.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. MANN. In the comparison which the gentleman has made I notice he has not called attention to the matter of the amount of vessel space required for coal by the two routes. Would it not require much more vessel space for coal going down the east coast of South America than it would going by way of the Panama Canal and recoaling at these different points?

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's suggestion is a proper one, and I had intended to develop it in connection with another branch of the subject. However, the idea suggested is this: If a vessel coals at Southampton for Valparaiso by way of the Magellan route it would have to take on a large supply of coal, thus diminishing its freight capacity. If a vessel can coal frequently at near-by stations it need use but a small space for coal and leave a large space for freight tonnage, thus increasing its freight earning capacity.

By use of the Panama route a vessel, say from Southampton, can coal at St. Thomas in the Danish West Indies, or St. Lucia in the Bahama Islands, and proceed to Panama, where it could take on coal at either Cristobal or Balboa and then cruise down the west coast and get coal at any of those ports. That is an added argument why vessels from Europe will be induced to use the Panama Canal.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman about the difference in the cost of the coal as between the starting point of the ships and the various coaling points to which he has called our attention. Would the difference in cost be sufficient to recompense the ship for the loss of freight that might be earned by reason of taking a full cargo of coal to supply it for the whole trip, as against coaling at the different points?

Mr. ESCH. I think that the best practice among shipowners is to seek to leave the port of clearance with a small cargo of coal and reload at intervals, thus permitting it to carry the maximum of freight-earning tonnage.

Mr. MADDEN. The point I want to get the gentleman to tell us about, if he will or can, is whether the difference in the price of coal at Liverpool or Southampton and Valparaiso is sufficient to offset the freight receipts which might be secured by a ship on account of leaving the port of Southampton with a small quantity of coal.

Mr. ESCH. Well, it would be very difficult to determine that in dollars and cents, owing to the fact that rates of freight vary very materially and the coal cost varies very materially.

Mr. MADDEN. But the gentleman must remember that freight has to be paid on the coal that is taken on board ship at Valparaiso, and freight must be paid on coal taken on board the ship at Panama or paid on coal taken on board at any other point of the West Indies—St. Thomas or any other place. Now, that freight must be added to the cost.

Mr. ESCH. I have figures here giving the coal cost at the various stations of the world and along the four great competitive routes which I will describe, and if I have the time I will be glad to take up that phase of it.

Mr. MADDEN. That side of the question is one that is very interesting.

Mr. ESCH. Yes; it is interesting. I wish next to call attention to Table III, showing the relation of Panama Canal tolls to the traffic between the Atlantic-Gulf seaboard of the United States and Australia and New Zealand.

The commerce of Australia and New Zealand is developing with very great rapidity. In 1909 the foreign commerce of Australia amounted to $550,000,000, an increase of $200,000,000 over the preceding decade. New Zealand's foreign trade in 1909 amounted to $175,000,000, an increase of $75,000,000 over the preceding decade. The commerce of our Atlantic and Gulf seaboard in 1910 with Australia and New Zealand amounted to $46,000,000, an increase of 68 per cent over the preceding decade. The importance of our canal securing an increasing share of this traffic between our Atlantic and Gulf seaboard and Australia and New Zealand ought to be apparent. I have here Table III, giving the saving in distance and days from New York to Adelaide on the south shore of Australia by using the Panama route as against the Cape of Good Hope route. The difference is 1,746 miles, showing a saving of 7½ days for a 9-knot ship and 6.7 days for a 10-knot ship. If Adelaide were the port of destination a saving in time of 6.7 days for a 10-knot ship would not be a large inducement for a vessel to pass through the Panama Canal and pay tolls. It might instead go around the Cape of Good Hope. At the present time our traffic between the Atlantic and Gulf seaboards and Australia is by means of line vessels around the Cape of Good Hope. That is a much longer route than even the Straits of Magellan. The Panama route will be the shortest. From New York to Melbourne, on the southeast shore of Australia, the saving, by using the Panama route as against the Cape of Good Hope route, would be 1,710 miles, represented by a saving of 12.3 days for a 9-knot ship and 11 days for a 10-knot ship. From this it would appear that a vessel could profitably use the Panama route and have one day's saving of time at sea to its credit. Sydney, on the east coast of Australia, and its greatest city, a city of 500,000 people, will be 3,932 miles nearer to New York by way of the Panama route than by way of the Cape of Good Hope, represented by a saving of 17.7 days for a 9-knot ship and 15.8 days for a 10-knot ship. Sydney, therefore, which all line vessels and most chartered vessels or tramps make, would determine the homeward route and not Adelaide or Melbourne.

It is thus seen that it would be profitable to use the Panama route, because there would be a margin of profit or of saving of 5.8 days for a 10-knot ship, after deducting 10 days saving in time to neutralize or compensate for the canal tolls. Wellington or Auckland, in the New Zealand Islands, would be nearer to New York by way of the Panama route by 2,493 miles over the route by the way of the Straits of Magellan, representing a saving of 11 days for a 9-knot ship and 9.9 days for a 10-knot ship. Even as to Wellington, the Panama route would be preferable to the Magellan route. What course a vessel will take after arriving at one of the ports of Australia for the home journey will depend not merely upon the saving of distance and of time, but upon other factors, such as facility of securing traffic and cargoes en route and on the cost of coal. However, Dr. Johnson believes that New Zealand could stand a toll of a dollar per net registered ton and the Panama Canal get at least 50 per cent of its traffic. A vessel in a south Australian port which had to leave Australia in ballast or with partial cargo would doubtless sail up to the East Indies, to Java or Sumatra or Singapore, for a cargo of Java coffee or sugar and then proceed through the Suez route back home, or it might possibly return home by the way of the Cape of Good Hope.

Table III shows that New Orleans will be nearer these ports of Australia via the Panama route by about 1,500 miles over New York, amounting to a saving for a 10-knot vessel of about 6 days. Even with Adelaide, such vessel would save 13.1 days as against the Cape of Good Hope route. The Panama route ought to secure in traffic between our Atlantic and Gulf seaports and Australia a fair percentage of that commerce and ought to secure at least 50 per cent of the growing commerce of New Zealand.

I next wish to call your attention to Table IV, showing the effect of tolls at the Isthmus of Panama on the traffic between Europe and Australia and New Zealand.

Here the distances are longer and the percentages will be less. A line which is equidistant from Liverpool by either the Panama or Suez route runs through Yokohama, about 200 miles east of the island of Guam and about 150 miles east of Sydney, Australia. All east of this line, therefore, would be nearer Europe by way of the Panama route, and all west of it, which would include the continent of Australia and most of the east coast of Asia, would be nearer by way of the Suez route. The question arises, will Australia and New Zealand give any of their commerce with Europe to the Panama route? It may expect to get some portion of this tonnage, but the Panama route would have to meet sharp competition with the Cape of Good Hope route and with the Suez route. The question of tolls and coal costs will be largely determinative as to the route.

Mr. BOWMAN. And some difference in insurance.

Mr. ESCH. There is some difference in insurance. At present the bulk of cargo from Europe to Australia passes around the Cape of Good Hope and does not pass through the Suez Canal. The Suez Canal is used largely by line steamers carrying fast mail and passengers. The 10-knot vessel carrying cargo prefers the Cape of Good Hope route to the Suez route, because it will have no tolls to pay, because of the cheap coal of Natal, South Africa, and because the Cape of Good Hope route is only about a thousand miles longer than the Suez route. We may expect some vessels outbound from Adelaide or Melbourne or Sydney, and especially New Zealand, to return to Europe by way of the Panama route.

New Zealand furnishes much cargo tonnage, especially in the line of frozen meats, and cargoes of frozen meats—refrigerated cargoes—will seek to go to Europe by the cooler route. The cooler route would doubtless be by way of Panama as against the route through the Suez Canal. The Red Sea, 1,300 miles in length, has almost torrid heat and is swept by the blasting winds from the desert, hence it is more difficult to carry refrigerated tonnage through the Suez route. We can expect a small tonnage from Australia and a considerable tonnage from New Zealand to pass through the Panama route to Europe.

Mr. LEWIS. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Maryland?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. LEWIS. You are just referring to the Suez Canal and the probability of some Panama traffic being diverted from that point.

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. LEWIS. May I ask the gentleman the character of the rates fixed for traffic on the Suez Canal, whether they are law-made rates or statutory rates that may not be changed by an administrative tribunal, and in that respect do they differ from the rates proposed in this measure now?

Mr. ESCH. The Suez rates are made by the company that practically owns and operates the Suez Canal. They are not statutory rates. The rates put in force on the Suez Canal on January 1 of this year were 6¾ francs per registered ton, amounting to about $1.30. But the Suez tonnage is measured by the Suez measurement, which differs from the British and American measurement in that it does not allow as large a deduction for bunker, engine, and other space as is allowed under the British and American measurement. Therefore the net registered tonnage at Suez is higher than it would be at Panama, and the same ship going through the Panama Canal would pay less tolls than if it passed through the Suez Canal. In other words, the $1.30 per net registered ton at Suez would amount to $1.53 at Panama.

Mr. MANN. Does not the Danube measurement which is used on the Suez Canal include 80 cubic feet to the ton, while the American measurement allows 100 cubic feet?

Mr. ESCH. Yes; that is also a factor in making the net-tonnage rate at Suez higher than our proposed rates at Panama, and this difference of $1 Panama rate and $1.53 equivalent Suez rate will be quite a determining factor in the routing of vessels.

I wish next to call attention to Table V, showing the relation of tolls on traffic between our Atlantic and Gulf seaboards and the region between Yokohama and Singapore, on the east coast of China, including the Philippine Islands.

Mr. RAKER. If the gentleman will permit me, the discussion came up yesterday that England had to do with this Suez company and owned the majority of the stock in it; that is, the Suez Canal. Is there anything in that?

Mr. ESCH. English citizens own some of the stock.

Mr. RAKER. But the English Government itself has nothing to do with the company?

Mr. ESCH. I think not. It is not owned by the Government.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The English Government owns a lot of the stock, but the company is under the control of a private company.

Mr. ESCH. This trade area between Yokohama and Singapore is largely within the influence of the Suez route. However, the northern portion of it may safely be considered as within the influence of the Panama route.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. From where?

Mr. ESCH. For instance, from New York to Yokohama it is nearer by 3,268 miles through the Panama Canal than by the Suez route, representing a saving of 17 days for a 9-knot ship and 15.2 days for a 10-knot ship; while Shanghai, on the Chinese coast, will be nearer via Panama than via Suez by 876 miles, represented by a saving of 8.1 days for a 9-knot ship and 7.3 days for a 10-knot ship. Hongkong, down the Chinese coast, will be nearer New York by way of Panama than by way of Suez by only 18 miles, and Manila will be nearer by only 41 miles.

In other words, the line equidistant from New York by way of Panama or Suez runs through Peking, China, through Hongkong, practically through Manila, and through the west-central part of Australia. Everything, therefore, on the east coast of Asia east of that line would fall within the influence of the Panama route, and all west of it, from Hongkong to Singapore, would fall within the influence of the Suez route. Can we hope for or expect any traffic from this region to use the Panama Canal?

Yes, we can, for the reason that the distances to Yokohama and even Shanghai show a saving in days of travel at sea almost equivalent to the number necessary to offset the canal tolls, but Hongkong and Manila are practically the same distance by either route, and therefore other factors, aside from distance, would determine the course of the vessel outbound from either of these two ports. As Manila is a possession of the United States, and as the coastwise-trade laws apply to it, we may expect to get most of the traffic of the Philippine Islands across the Pacific through the Panama Canal to our Gulf and Atlantic seaboard.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. It would be impossible to state this matter of distances any more clearly than the gentleman is stating them; but I will ask if it is not the fact that all ports in western Pacific waters, not only the Asiatic ports, but the Australasian islands, are in the Suez Canal zone from all European ports?

Mr. ESCH. The next table will give the distances and show that very fact.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I assume that that is what your chart will show, that all Asiatic and Australasian ports are in the Suez zone from all European ports.

Mr. ESCH. This red line shows that all west of it is within the influence of the Suez route for European ports.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. In addition to that, as a practical proposition, these ports are nearly all in a competitive zone as between New York and European ports?

Mr. ESCH. Yes; there is an overlapping territory along the coast of China.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Even from New York we have got to fight Europe for all the traffic that we get in this zone?

Mr. ESCH. Yes. Another thing: The Suez influence is well established, because it is a route that has been traveled since 1869. The banking facilities and trading companies along it also tend to attract and hold the traffic with Europe through the Suez route, so that, as the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] well says, we will have to fight for whatever traffic we are able to get from, say, Shanghai down to Singapore; but Table V also shows that New Orleans would have an advantage over New York of about 2,000 miles to Yokohama, Manila, and the great ports of China, permitting her to offer strong competition to vessels using the Suez route.

Mr. SIMS. In case the Suez Canal should reduce its charges the competitive zone will naturally move east to that extent.

Mr. ESCH. Certainly; and it will be, to the extent of the reduction, a potent influence in determining the course of vessels, except line vessels, which can not deviate from their course. It would have a large influence on chartered vessels or tramps.

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to inquire as to the character of rate making on the Suez Canal. Is it entirely free, as it would be with a private railroad company, to change the rates? If so, has there been much change in rate making through the canal in the last generation?

Mr. ESCH. The directors of the Suez company—I think it is the Suez Maritime Co.—fix the rates from time to time. From 1869 to 1884 the rates remained practically at 10 francs a registered ton. After 1884 changes were made every few years, until in January, 1912, the rate was reduced to 6.75 francs a net registered ton, and the directors will doubtless in the near future make a still further reduction to meet the competition of the Panama route, so that I look to see the time when they will reduce the rate to $1 a net registered ton, as we have proposed to fix it at Panama.

Mr. LEWIS. They can make those reductions without regard to any governmental action.

Mr. ESCH. Without regard to any governmental action——

Mr. LEWIS. Or action of the British Parliament?

Mr. ESCH. Or action of the British Parliament.

Mr. KENT. Are they under any sort of obligation to levy uniform tolls?

Mr. ESCH. Yes; under the Suez agreement the tolls are equal to all nations, without discrimination.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman discuss the dangers attending the navigation through these two great highways?

Mr. ESCH. Which two does the gentleman mean?

Mr. FOWLER. I mean the Suez Canal and the Panama Canal.

Mr. ESCH. I have already described the Magellan route.

Mr. FOWLER. Yes; I know the gentleman has.

Mr. ESCH. The Suez route would be more dangerous than the Panama route for oriental trade, on account of the terrific storms that sweep over the Indian Ocean. Crossing the Pacific we have comparative freedom from storms. We, however, would have the disadvantage of a stormy passage possibly across the North Atlantic.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Can the gentleman tell the committee whether the insurance rates as between these two competitive routes, where they are real competitors, would be to the advantage of the Panama route?

Mr. ESCH. Oh, certainly; and it would be an advantage to the Panama route as compared with the Magellan route and as compared with the Suez route where it crosses the Indian Ocean.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Will the gentleman state why the advantage will be with the Panama route in the oriental trade? It is on account of the voyage over the Pacific, is it not?

Mr. ESCH. That is comparatively a safe voyage as compared with the voyage by the Suez Canal and across the Indian Ocean.

Now, I wish to call your attention to Table VI, showing the relation of tolls at Panama on the traffic between Europe and Yokohama and Singapore, including the Philippine Islands.

Yokohama	694	2.7	2.4	1.9	1.5	1.3	Panama route via San Francisco. Suez route via Colombo, Singapore, Hongkong, and Shanghai.

As already stated, the red line on the map passing through Yokohama marks the line which is equidistant from Liverpool by way of either route, and as all the Chinese coast lies west of that line it is normally within the influence of the Suez route.

There are regions that we can not influence, so far as traffic goes, nor can we seduce traffic from the Suez route to or from such regions to the Panama route. The Suez route will have absolute monopoly of all traffic on the east coast of Africa and the east and west coasts of India, and the Malay Peninsula, Java, and possibly Sumatra. We can not hope to break into that zone of traffic. On the other hand, the Panama route will have zones where it will be supreme and where the Suez route can not encroach.

In regard to this traffic between the Chinese coast and Europe, both the Magellan route and the Cape of Good Hope, can be ignored because they are too long to enter into competition. We may expect some vessels outbound, securing cheap coal at Yokohama, to cross the Pacific on the arc of the great circle to Tacoma, Seattle, or San Francisco; thence down the coast to Panama and on to Europe. The reverse movement may also be true; that is, vessels may seek to cross the Atlantic from Europe in the hope of getting a cargo on our Atlantic seaboard and proceed through the canal to San Francisco or the Sound cities and cross the Pacific to Yokohama, Shanghai, or Manila.

At present there is considerable traffic across the Atlantic to European ports where cargoes are transshipped to vessels bound for the Orient through the Suez Canal. When the Panama Canal is opened that movement may be exactly reversed, and vessels from Europe may be willing to take cargoes at cheap rates across to New York, Baltimore, and Philadelphia and there have them transshipped to vessels passing through the Panama Canal bound for the Orient. So that even as to these two trade areas we may expect a small share of the traffic. This concludes my consideration of the relation of tolls to the traffic of the various trade areas affected by the opening of the new route at Panama.

But there is another potential factor which determines the route of vessels, namely, the cost of coal. The greatest cost of a vessel at sea is the cost of its fuel. Last year there were 75,000,000 tons of coal sold to ocean-going vessels, representing a cost of $250,000,000.

I wish now, if I have the time, to show coal costs along these various competitive routes in order to show the advantages of the Panama route based upon cheaper coal costs. A vessel starting from Southampton with Welsh coal, probably the best coal used by ocean-going craft, can secure that coal at Southampton for $5.06 a ton trimmed. It can take on a sufficient supply to carry it to the Straits of Gibraltar, where there is another coaling station, and it can buy Welsh coal there for $5.28 to $5.76 a ton. Then it can proceed to Algiers, on the north coast of Africa, and get Welsh coal there for $5.40 a ton. It could then proceed to Port Said, the northern entrance to the Suez Canal. Port Said is one of the greatest coaling stations in the world. Last year there was shipped to that port from England one and one-quarter million tons of Welsh coal. It is there sold to vessels by several dealers, and the competition between the dealers serves to keep the price down. Coal at the coaling stations along the older routes of travel is sold by contract from dealers, and vessel owners make yearly contracts with these dealers, securing a cheaper rate than is charged to the occasional vessel or tramp steamer. Good and ample coaling facilities can be found along the entire Suez route, and they are better than along any other route. At Port Said the cost of Welsh coal, 1912 contract prices, is $6.12 to $6.24 per ton. The occasional vessel or tramp steamer would have to pay about $6.50. Please bear this in mind when we come to consider the cost of coal at Panama.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. What is the coal worth at the port of shipment?

Mr. ESCH. Five dollars and six cents at Southampton, which would be a little more than the cost at Cardiff.

At Port Said or Suez the vessel can take on coal enough to carry it to Colombo, on the island of Ceylon.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. ESCH. Can not the gentleman from Minnesota yield me a little more time?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The gentleman will remember that I yielded an hour to the gentleman from California, and I could not grant him any more. The gentleman will remember the colloquy that I had with the gentleman from Washington [Mr.

HUMPHREY], and how he insisted upon me yielding. I yielded an hour to the gentleman from California, and it is up to him. If he cares to yield time to the gentleman, very well.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Washington is willing to have it taken out of his time, I have no objection.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Oh, I do not want to have it taken out of my time.

Mr. BUTLER. But, as I understand, general debate has not been limited.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wisconsin be permitted to proceed for 15 minutes.

Mr. MANN. That can not be done.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Then I will ask the gentleman from Minnesota to yield the gentleman 15 minutes.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. Chairman, I am willing to take it out of our time if it will not be taken out of the time of the gentleman from Washington. The gentleman from Wisconsin has not taken up the question of tolls, and I think it is no more than fair that our side should let him have the time. [Applause.]

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Very well, with that understanding I will yield to the gentleman 15 minutes.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I am very grateful to the gentleman and to the House. At Colombo Welsh coal first comes into competition with foreign coal. At Colombo Welsh coal is sold, under 1912 prices, for $8.16 a ton. The Bengal or native coal is sold for $5.16 a ton, while the Natal coal, brought up from South Africa, can be had for $6.12 per ton, all f. o. b., trimmed. From Colombo the vessel could proceed, for instance, to Singapore, another of the great coaling stations along the Suez route. At Singapore Welsh coal can be obtained for $8.40 per ton. Australian coal, brought up from the Newcastle fields, near Sydney, can be obtained for $5.76 to $6 per ton, while Japanese coal can be obtained for $5.40, f. o. b. At Yokohama the cheap Japanese coal, known as Yubari lump, can be had for $5.40 a ton.

Let us now consider coal costs by way of the Cape of Good Hope route. A vessel would again coal at Southampton with Welsh coal at $5.06 a ton. It could coal again at Cape Vincent, where it would have to pay $7.50 for Welsh coal. It could then proceed to Cape Town or to Durban, South Africa, where Natal coal could be obtained as cheaply as $3.28 to $3.48 a ton, free alongside ship. It could then proceed to Australia and obtain coal at Melbourne, on the south coast, Newcastle or southern Australian coal, for $4.50 a ton, free alongside ship. Then it could proceed to Sydney, which is only 60 miles from the great Newcastle coal fields, and get the best quality of southern coal for $3.84 a ton.

Proceeding now by way of the Magellan route, the vessel would again coal at Southampton and recoal at St. Vincent, possibly, and go down to Montevideo, where it could get Welsh admiralty coal by paying $10.32 a ton. It could also get native coal at Coronel, Chile, over on the west coast of South America, at $5.60 per ton.

Let us now consider the coal cost by way of our proposed Panama route. The secretary of the Isthmian Canal Commission has just sent me the contract prices for the delivery of coal at Panama from Newport News. The contract made by the Government last month is at the rate of $2.70 per ton for coal at Newport, with a contract price of $1.39½ per ton to carry it down to Cristobal and unload it from the hold of the vessel. The cost, therefore, delivered at Cristobal for the current year will be $4.09½ per ton. If the Government makes an overhead charge of, say, 50 cents per ton to cover depreciation and a small profit, coal could be sold at $4.59½ per ton to passing ships.

Mr. NYE. Is that substantially the same quality of coal?

Mr. ESCH. Our New River and Pocahontas coal has 5 per cent less heat efficiency than the Welsh coal, the Welsh coal being the best bituminous coal used by steam vessels. Then it will cost 50 cents a ton to take this coal through the canal and deliver it at the coaling station at Balboa, so when the canal is finished, under present contract prices, we may safely state that coal can be sold at a small profit by the Government at Cristobal at $4.50 a ton and at Balboa, on the Pacific side, for $5 per ton. Proceeding through the canal and up the west coast the vessel can recoal at San Francisco. Comax coal from British Columbia at San Francisco is sold at $6.90 per ton. Carbon Hill or Washington coal can be gotten at Seattle for $4.15 and the best Comax lump, at Comax or Union, British Columbia, for $5 per ton. This gives the coal cost from the Atlantic seaboard to the Pacific coast. To-day coal is sold at New York for $3 to $3.25 per ton and at Newport News for $3 per ton. A vessel passing through the canal gets cheap coal at the Isthmus, and can get a fairly good supply at cheap rates at the Sound; it can then cross the Pacific and get a good supply of cheap Japanese coal at Yokohama or Nagasaki, taking on enough to make the trip down to Shanghai or Manila and return. Homeward bound it can secure a supply at the same rates. A review of the coal situation leads to this conclusion:

The coal cost along the Suez route will be probably higher than the coal cost along the Panama route, and the coal cost along the Cape of Good Hope route will be cheaper than along the Magellan route. In order to show what a factor the cost of coal is in determining the route of a vessel, I wish to give you an illustration. Last year a steamer of 4,640 gross tons—2,927 net tons—with a speed of 10½ knots, made the round trip from New York to Manila by way of the Suez Canal. It consumed 4,475 tons of coal, costing $20,868.75. Maj. Wilson, chief commissary officer at the Isthmus, estimated what that same vessel's coal cost would be if it had gone through the Panama route by way of San Francisco and Yokohama. He estimated that according to the 1911 prices the total coal consumption would be about the same in amount, but the cost would be $18,222, a saving of $2,646.25. Had the 1912 prices prevailed the saving would have been $3,164, or more than the canal tolls on this vessel at the Isthmus. Finally, the relative efficiency of various coals can be shown by the daily consumption of a given vessel. The relative steaming value for a vessel of 3,550 gross tons is as follows: It would burn 22 tons per day of best No. 1 Cardiff coal; 25 tons of Tyne or Lancashire (English) coal; 29 to 30 tons of Indian (Bengal) coal; 29 to 30 tons of Japanese; 24 to 25 tons of Newcastle (Australian); 30 tons of Coronel (Chile); only 24 to 25 tons of Sterling, New River, or Berwind White (American); 26 tons of Alabama coal. From this it is evident that our American coals compare very favorably in heat efficiency with the coals produced elsewhere and sold on other routes. This concludes consideration of coal costs in relation to traffic on the Panama and competitive routes.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. In figuring these costs by the Panama route up north thence to Yokohama, the gentleman has not figured what it would be if we were able to develop the coal fields of Alaska, has he?

Mr. ESCH. That is a factor that can not be determined until we develop our coal fields in Alaska. I wish to call attention in that connection to this significant fact, that the arc of the great circle route passes only a few miles south of the available coal fields of Alaska, and in time it may be possible to develop these fields and establish a coaling station on one of the Aleutian Islands, thus aiding the traffic which we hope to get.

A word as to the probable traffic which will pass through the canal. In Dr. Johnson's first report, published in 1901, he gives an estimate of the possible tonnage which could have used the canal during the year 1899 had the same been open. He found that a possible net registered tonnage of 4,891,075 tons could have passed through the canal that year. In 1910 he made another investigation and found that a possible net tonnage of 8,328,029 tons could, or possibly would have used the canal that year, showing an increase of 66½ per cent in 11 years. He estimates that if the same percentage of increase were to continue during the five years from 1910 to 1915, a total traffic of 10,500,000 net registered tons would be available for passage through the canal during 1915. If, during the decade following the formal opening of the canal in 1915, a rate of increase of only 60 per cent is maintained, we could reasonably expect that in 1925 a total of 17,000,000 net registered tons would pass through the canal, but it is too much to expect that during the first year of operation, 1915, there will be 10,500,000 net registered tons of available traffic which will use the canal. It will take several years for steamship lines to fully establish themselves, and only actual trial can develop the full advantages of the Panama over the Suez and other competitive routes. Moreover, it will require time to fully establish and supply coaling stations along the new route. The traffic during the first few years through the Suez Canal was disappointing. During the first year, 1870, only 486 vessels passed through that canal, and in 1871 only 765. The average net tonnage per vessel for these two years was less than 1,000 tons.

At a dollar per net registered ton the revenue from tolls during the first year of operation, 1915, would amount to $10,500,000, provided the total net registered tonnage estimated as available for the use of the canal would pass through it, but such revenue can not be expected. It will fall short for the first few years. According to the testimony of Col. Goethals and other experts, the annual cost of operation of the canal, including sanitation, policing, and so forth, will amount to $4,000,000. The interest on the bonds which have been and will hereafter be issued to meet the cost of construction will amount, at 3 per cent, to $11,250,000, or a total of over $15,000,000. Therefore, for some years after the opening of the canal, the total revenues will not meet the cost of operation and the fixed charges. This is taking no account whatever of the cost of maintaining an armed force on the Isthmus and manning the defenses which are now being constructed there. If such expenses be added, the total cost will approximate $30,000,000 per annum. Even if the cost of maintaining the armed force and the fortifications be entirely charged off, a large revenue will have to be derived from tolls to meet the cost of operation and fixed charges, and a charge of a dollar per net registered ton, including charges on vessels of the United States engaged in coastwise trade, will be insufficient for some years to meet the same. While our Government has no design to make the canal a revenue producer, good administration would dictate that such revenue be secured from its operation as would meet the cost of operation and of fixed charges with the least detriment or discouragement to commerce seeking to use the same.

The work of the great engineers on the Isthmus is about concluded, a work worthy of the admiration of the world. It remains for us as legislators to do our part to fittingly supplement their work to the end that the success of the canal may be complete.

Under the dome of St. Paul's Cathedral in the city of London is the tomb of Sir Christopher Wren, the greatest of English architects. On that tomb is a tablet on which is inscribed:

If you would see his monument, look about you.

If I had my way, I would construct on "a peak in Darien," on the summit of the Cordilleras, on the very brink of Culebra, a monument of brass or enduring granite in honor of Col. Goethals and his splended staff. [Applause.] And thereon I would engrave this testimonial:

If you would see their monument, look about you.

[Loud applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. FOSTER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 6508. An act to exempt from cancellation certain desert-land entries in the Chuckawalla Valley, Cal.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to reports of the committees of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bills of the following titles:

S. 5624. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; and

H. R. 19238. An act to amend section 90 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911.

OPERATION OF PANAMA CANAL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY].

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I have just listened with a great deal of pleasure and a great deal of profit to the very able speech of the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH].

What time I shall take I shall devote entirely to the question of the tolls, as this is a question that vitally affects, in my judgment, not only the Pacific coast, but the use of the canal by the entire country.

This question of the Panama Canal tolls, it seems to me, can be stated in a single sentence: The People v. The Railroads.

This is the entire case of the Panama Canal, so far as tolls are concerned. This is the case. The court is the American Congress. It is for us to decide this contest between the people and the railroads. I care not at what angle you may look upon the question. I care not in what shape the arguments may come. I care not from what apparent source springs the opposition. I care not what reasons may be given or what pretense may be advanced in favor of tolls for coastwise ships through the Panama Canal, it all comes back to this: The People v. The Railroads.

I have never belonged to that class of men who have denounced corporations because they were corporations; that have denounced great interests because they were great interests; that have believed that any great business was evil simply because it was large. I have never belonged to that class of men who seek every opportunity to stand upon the floor of the House and proclaim that they are the friends of the people. I have never been one of those who have condemned and denounced the railroads of this country.

I have never been one of those who have denounced those who have constructed and run our railroads. In fact, I have always believed, and believe now, that many of the men engaged in the building and construction of railroads have been great benefactors of the people; that this country owes to them a debt of gratitude. I would not to-day injure the railroads in the least degree. I believe that they should be permitted to make a legitimate profit. I believe that the prosperity of the railroads is largely the prosperity of the entire country, and that you can not injure the railroads without injuring the whole people of this Nation.

But believing all this is no reason why I should not be opposed, as I am unalterably opposed to the railroads controlling the Panama Canal. I believe that we have constructed the Panama Canal primarily for the purpose, from a commercial standpoint, of having competition between the railroads and the ships that shall run through the canal. Every attempt to impose tolls upon the coastwise trade is an attempt to throttle this competition and to that extent benefit the railroads.

Who has asked for tolls upon coastwise trade? The railroads. Who has appeared before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and asked that tolls be placed upon our domestic trade? No one. What business interests have appeared before that committee opposing free tolls? No one.

It is most remarkable that this great committee of the House should make a report against free tolls when no one interested has appeared before them and argued against the proposition, when no interest in all this country thought it worth while to appear before that committee and protest that free tolls would injure them. What does canal tolls mean? It means that much obstruction to commerce. It means taking just that much from the people to give to the railroads. Every dollar paid in tolls means several dollars paid to the railroads. It is a dollar given to perpetuate the greatest and most powerful monopoly that ever existed in this country.

Canal tolls is an effort to take from the American people the benefit of the many millions that we have spent in the construction of the canal and transfer this benefit to the great transcontinental railroads. The railroads of this country did everything within their power to prevent the construction of the canal, and now, by the assistance of the majority of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, it is proposed to turn over to them the benefits of this canal after it has been constructed.

Many people of this country and perhaps many Members of this House may think that there exists to-day competition between the water and the rail transportation companies. That is a great mistake. No such conditions exist now, and no such conditions ever have existed in this country. Most of the regular steamship lines that ply up and down the Atlantic coast are absolutely controlled by the railroads. Most of the steamship lines that run up and down the Pacific coast are controlled absolutely by the railroads. Most of the steamship lines upon the Great Lakes are absolutely controlled by the railroads. Do you suppose that there is any competition between the railroads and these railroad-controlled lines of steamships? The statement of the fact answers the question conclusively to any sane man. No amount of subterfuge or evasion can conceal the truth. There never has been any real competition in this country between rail and water traffic. This is fully shown by an examination of the history of water transportation, and it is also fully shown by an examination of the interstate-commerce reports. The American people had hoped, and they had a right to hope, that the completion of the Panama Canal would mean the end of this complete monopoly of transportation, both on land and sea, by the railroads. People of this country hoped that, at least between the two coasts, we would have competition, and that at last we would have an opportunity by actual trial to see what would be the result of competition between rail and ship. Such competition will do more than all courts and commissions to regulate traffic and to produce a fair and reasonable rate for shipper and consumer. But now it is proposed, at the request of the railroads, and of the railroads alone, so far as the records show and so far as the hearings show, to forget the interests of the American people and, in violation of every principle heretofore followed by our Nation, to protect the railroads of the country by imposing a tax upon domestic traffic, which in the last analysis is the American public.

It is the first time, so far as I know, in the history of this Republic, except in time of war, that it is proposed to place a tax upon domestic commerce, and this proposal is made, not because money is needed in the National Treasury, but to protect the greatest monopoly that exists in the Nation. The majority of the committee that made this report may think that they have deceived the American people by their arguments that the canal must be made to pay for itself, by the statement that our treaties prevent our giving free tolls, by the sophistry that a tax is not a burden upon commerce, but while they may deceive themselves and possibly may deceive the majority of this House, yet nine-tenths of the people of this country believe as I believe—they know as I know—that canal tolls are for the benefit of the transcontinental railroads, and for no one else.

All through the hearings upon page after page is found this line of argument in the form of questions submitted by those who favor the bill as reported: "Will not ships, if permitted to go through the canal free, be able to carry freight so low that the railroads can not compete with them?" The solicitude of the majority of the committee as shown by these hearings for the railroads was truly and touchingly pathetic. No one, so far as I know, has attempted to show that such competition would seriously injure the railroads. While Mr. James J. Hill, if he is correctly reported, has said, in his opinion, that such competition would not injure the railroads or seriously interfere with their business, it is my understanding that experts before the committee testified that not more than 10 per cent of the traffic carried by the railroads would be directly affected by vessels running through the canal. It can not greatly injure the railroads if we are to believe the only evidence we have upon the subject, and if we are to exercise common and ordinary judgment, but it might reduce their earnings.

This is the foundation of the objection to free tolls, if we have a free canal for coastwise trade it will take away from the railroads just that much of their power to arbitrarily fix freight rates. It will tend to destroy their absolute monopoly. It will give us an opportunity for the first time in the history of this Nation to know what is the result of real competition between freight carried by land and water.

But, suppose for the sake of the argument, that free tolls would bring a ruinous competition. Suppose that a large portion of the traffic could be carried so much more cheaply by ships than the railroads that the railroads could not compete. Would that be a public evil? Is not the public entitled to the cheapest rate obtainable? What are we building the canal for? To reduce rates as much as possible or simply to reduce them to a point where the railroads can profitably compete? When before in the history of this Nation has it been proposed to ask the assistance of Congress by way of law to protect one domestic industry from the competition of another domestic industry?

Many enlightened people of this Nation protest to-day, and always have protested, against protecting by law an American industry even against the competition of a foreign industry. The most radical protectionist has never gone so far as is now proposed by this majority report—to exercise the power of the Government to protect one American industry from another American industry.

As I have said before, I have never been one of those who have denounced what is called the "interests," but in the 10 years that I have been a Member of Congress the proposition that comes from the committee to impose tolls upon domestic traffic passing through the Panama Canal is the most indefensible and the most shameless attempt that has ever been made to turn over at the expense of the people a great public work for the benefit of the private interests.

BENEFIT OF TOLLS.

Who will be benefited by free tolls and who will be injured? Who has appeared before the committee and pointed out, or attempted to point out, that if free tolls are granted they will be injuriously affected? No one. It has been secretly circulated about the Halls of Congress that if free tolls are given some unusual calamity, like the San Francisco earthquake or the sinking of the Titanic, will befall somebody and somewhere. But who and where and why? This awful foreboding is so appalling that no one speaks of it except in whispers, and none has been so bold as to commit to print his thoughts upon the subject. From day to day those favoring a free canal have been assured that if we only knew the facts, that if we only understood the situation, we would see the error of our way, but none has yet had the courage to attempt to enlighten us. Two fearful things have been whispered: First, that the railroads have threatened to increase interior rates if free tolls are given; second, that free tolls will injure the jobbing trade of Chicago.

If there is anyone who believes that this is true, they should long since have given their reasons to the House and to the public, and they should do so now. As to the railroads increasing their rates, it is self-evident that this is not true. Who ever knew a case whereby one competitor lowering his rates compelled the other to increase his? It is just as true as the law of gravitation that the lowering of the water rate tends to lower the rail rate. To say that free tolls—that is to say, lower water rates—will mean higher rail rates will be as absurd as to contend that the apple Newton saw did not fall but ascended. The action of the majority of the committee all the way through the hearing distinctly showed that they did not believe that rail rates would be increased, for their actions demonstrated that they constantly saw the appalling shadow of a rate so low that it would injure the railroads if they were compelled to meet it.

Will the jobbing interests of Chicago suffer by a free canal? I doubt it. No evidence, at least, has been made public so far as I know to prove it. It is true that the head and front of the opposition to free tolls has come from the railroads and Chicago interests; and the Chicago interests, like the railroad interests, have not seen fit to take the public into their confidence and show to them how they would be injured. But suppose it would limit the Chicago field of jobbing trade. Suppose that the field of trade of New York, Boston, and Philadelphia should be extended westward. Suppose that the field of trade of New Orleans, Galveston, and other Gulf cities should be extended northward. Suppose that the field of trade of San Francisco, Portland, and Seattle should be extended eastward. Would this be any reason to keep up freight rates and place an additional burden upon 80,000,000 of people to benefit a few in the jobbing business located in Chicago?

If it be true—and I do not believe it—that Chicago, because of its location, would be injured by free tolls, then it has no more reason to complain than has any other city that is not favored by being on tidewater.

The majority of the committee attempts to show that competition through the canal will benefit only that portion of the country near deep water, while the whole country is to pay for the canal.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I yield.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. The gentleman said that these tolls collected at the canal would not be put into the Treasury. Where would they be put?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. One dollar would be put into the Treasury and ten into the treasury of the railroads.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. I am talking now about the actual tolls collected. We will take care of the railroads later on. Where will they be put?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If you put these tolls in the Treasury, you take them out of one pocket of the people and put them in another, and you simply add the cost of the transaction.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Is it not the other way? If they do not pay the tolls, money is taken out of the Treasury to operate the canal, and the people must pay from one pocket or the other, either by a tax to pay for the deficit or the people who use the canal pay it. The question we are up against is whether the people who get the special benefit directly, for the ships and the shippers, should pay that little expense or whether the people who do not get any direct benefit should pay it. That is the contention, and I wish the gentleman would discuss that—whether all the people shall pay or the people who get the benefit shall pay?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If the gentleman will give me the opportunity, I shall be pleased to do so. The majority attempts to show that the competition through the canal will benefit only that portion of the country near deep water, while the whole country has to pay for the canal.

They claim that this competition through the canal will not affect interior rates. If this be true, then why the agitation of Chicago? Her field of trade is not along the seacoast. Evidently Chicago does not believe that a free canal will affect freight rates only along the ocean edge. But suppose, for the sake of the argument, that we admit that a free canal would only lower freight rates and increase trade near deep water. If you will look at the census report you will see that 46,117,000 of the people of this country live within a hundred miles of deep water. What, then, becomes of that vast majority that we have heard so much about that lives somewhere in the far interior that has paid so much toward the construction of the canal who will be benefited by it so little? One of the members of the committee favoring the report said in the hearing that not one-third of the population of the United States would be benefited by the construction of the canal, yet considerably more than one-half of the population live within a hundred miles of deep-water transportation. You draw a line south from Chicago to the Ohio River, thence west to the Rocky Mountains, thence north to the Canadian boundary and you will have practically all of the territory of the United States where freight rates and trade are not directly and powerfully influenced to-day by the water and rail rates between the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts by way of the Isthmus. Approximately speaking, the rates to-day from the Pacific coast to the Atlantic by way of the Isthmus, and from ports on the Atlantic as far west as Chicago, and from ports on the Gulf to the interior points and as far north as the Ohio River, are the same as direct rail rates from the Pacific to these points. In other words, it costs less to-day to send a thousand feet of lumber from Seattle to Philadelphia by way of the isthmus and from Philadelphia back westward to Indianapolis than it does to send it directly by rail from Seattle to Indianapolis. It costs less to send a ton of canned salmon from Seattle to New Orleans by way of the isthmus and from New Orleans northward approximately to the Ohio River than it does to send it directly from Seattle by rail to these points. It is cheaper to reach practically all points in Texas and Oklahoma by way of the isthmus than it is directly by rail from Seattle to these points. In some instances rail and water rates meet even much farther west.

And what I say as to Seattle applies to other Pacific coast points as far south as San Francisco. Take as an illustration the rail and water rates meet as far west as Duluth on canned salmon. On soda ash the rate from Hutchinson, Kans., to the Pacific coast is the same as the rate from New York to the Pacific coast by the Isthmus. In this case we have the water rate fixing the freight rate miles eastward from the Pacific coast.

To explain more fully I will refer to the map showing the rates on two of the chief commodities of the Pacific coast—fir lumber and canned salmon—that are shipped to the eastern portion of the United States. I will show the various rates to different points by all rail and by water and rail across the Isthmus of Panama to Atlantic and Gulf ports, and from these ports to various points in the interior. The figures marked "R" is the direct mail rate from the Pacific coast to points mentioned. The figures marked "W & R" is the rate by water and rail, by way of the Isthmus. The figures marked "R, W & L" is the rate by way of the Isthmus, then by rail to the Great Lakes, and by the Great Lakes to the point mentioned.

Now, to explain more fully what I mean, I will illustrate here on the map, because I have heard a great deal of argument to the effect that only the portion of the country along the coasts will be benefited. I am quoting from the actual statements made from the tariff rates on fir lumber and on canned salmon, the most recent I could get, which were of December of last year. You take lumber to-day from Seattle, and it will come down here to the Isthmus of Panama, be transferred on the cars, and carried 103 miles by rail across the Isthmus, come up here to Philadelphia by another boat, and be carried back west to Pittsburgh by the railroads for 49 cents a hundred, while the direct rail rate from Seattle to Pittsburgh is 68 cents a hundred.

Now, take another illustration. You take Concord, and you will find that the all-rail rate is 75 cents.

The water rate is 55 cents. Take it as far west as Cincinnati, the all-rail rate is 64 cents. The water rate is 60 cents.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. What is called the water rate?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The water rate is the rate by water from Seattle to the isthmus, then across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec by railroad, and from there to New York by water and back to the point mentioned in the interior by rail. That is what I mean by water route, although it is both rail and water.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I wanted to know the route.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. That is the route. Now, for the sake of illustration, I will take Indianapolis, between Illinois and Indiana, is about where these two rates meet; at that point the two rates are the same. Take the rate to Indianapolis as an illustration. The all-rail rate from Seattle, and when I say Seattle I mean all Pacific coast ports, for the rate is the same from all, on lumber is 63 cents, while the water rate is 61 cents.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does not that charge include the rate across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes; it includes the entire cost of sending the lumber from Seattle to those points that I have mentioned.

Mr. BOWMAN. What is the Panama Railroad rate on lumber?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. That I do not know. Now, you take canned salmon, which is one of the big industries of the Pacific coast, amounting to $30,000,000 last year, and you can send that product to New Orleans and up the Mississippi to St. Louis cheaper than you can ship it direct by rail. A short time ago a cargo of barley was sent from the Pacific coast across the isthmus and up to New Orleans and up to St. Louis for considerably less than the direct rail rate.

Now, as an extreme illustration of cases where you use water again, you take the canned salmon. It comes to New York by the water route and goes up to Buffalo, and there is again placed on a vessel and goes out to Duluth, and there practically meets the direct railroad rate from Seattle at that point.

Now, what becomes of your argument that only the people along the Pacific coast and the Atlantic coast and Gulf coast are benefited by the canal rates if you can to-day bring lumber and many other products down to the Isthmus and there transship them and carry them 103 miles by rail and place them again in ships and bring them to Atlantic and Gulf ports and then take them back west a thousand miles and up north a thousand miles from these ports as cheaply as you can send them direct? What becomes of the argument that only the two coasts of the country are going to be benefited by the Panama Canal?

Mr. NYE. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. NYE. What is the relative cost of the transshipment across the Isthmus as compared with the total cost?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I do not know. I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that if you take this space indicated by the yellow line on the map, it approximately represents to-day the only portion of the United States where rail and water rates do not meet and where they are not directly affected; that is, for a distance of 300 or 400 miles south of Chicago, and thence west to the Rocky Mountains, and thence north to Canada.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Washington yield to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. The gentleman has in detail mentioned the relatives rates on lumber. Of course, that is a commodity that can always be carried in bulk very cheaply, and a commodity which lends itself very readily to water transportation, and, therefore, the water cost of transporting a commodity of that kind is very much less than the rail cost of transporting other commodities, like grain or ore or manufactured goods. Can the gentleman give us any statistics showing the relative costs of transporting general merchandise, as we might call it, or dried fruits or cotton fabrics or woolen fabrics, if anything of that character should be desired to be transported?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; when I started on this subject I specifically stated this was on certain freight and that on other commodities the difference is not so great. The water rates are not so much different from the rail rates on many commodities. I am now speaking particularly of the great commodities of the Pacific coast that we want to get into these markets, on the Atlantic, and the great Middle West, and those great commodities are our lumber and our canned salmon.

The other way, going back to the Pacific, the greatest purchases, perhaps, are steel and machinery that come from Pittsburgh, Cleveland, and the Middle West, all of which, after the canal is open, can reach the Pacific coast at a cheaper rate by water than they now reach it by rail.

Mr. MILLER. Take commodities manufactured in the East, to be transported to the west coast, and the same rule which the gentleman has indicated in reference to lumber would not apply.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes, it would; on certain commodities.

Now, I want to call the attention of the committee to this fact, that whenever you reduce these rates along the coast, interior rates must be reduced. I have heard arguments made here upon the floor of the House that if we reduce the rates to the coast the railroads will probably increase the interior rates to make up their losses; but this is the first time that I have ever heard the argument made that one competitor lowering his rates must compel the other to increase his. To show you the absurdity of that statement, suppose that we reduced the rates until the rate from New York as far east as Spokane and over into Idaho and Montana, and in all that portion of the country, is less than it is from Chicago. Chicago will either reduce her rates or New York will take that market from her. We know what Chicago will do, what she must do; she must meet the New York rate to the advantage of the buyer and seller.

Now, the argument has been made, and admitting for the sake of argument that it is true, that the east coast and the west coast will be more directly benefited by the canal, and by the remission of tolls, than will the interior, a proposition which I do not admit, except for the sake of argument. Suppose it were true. Can anyone demonstrate, for instance, that the people upon the Pacific coast are as directly benefited by the Soo Canal and by the improvement of the Great Lakes as the people in that portion of the country nearer the Lake ports? If you are going to adopt that argument, then why should not a special rate be placed upon shipping that goes through the Soo Canal?

Can anyone demonstrate that the many millions that we have put into the Mississippi River and its tributaries—more millions than we have put into the Panama Canal, and we are still putting in other millions—can anyone demonstrate that those millions directly benefit the Pacific coast and the Atlantic coast as much as they do the Mississippi Valley? Yet the Atlantic and the Pacific coast help to pay for those improvements. If you are going upon that theory, why do you not place a charge upon the vessels that run up and down the Mississippi River? I exclude the Missouri, because, in spite of all the millions we have spent on it, there are no vessels upon it.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The gentleman is getting away from a point where I would like to ask him a question.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The gentleman has stated that the interior points will derive some of the benefits of the lower rates that will result from the Panama route. I want to ask the gentleman if he does not think that such a lowering of rates as he anticipates to coast points, and as he thinks ought to be brought about, will greatly intensify the rate struggle between coast and interior points which has resulted in the enactment of the long-and-short-haul clause of the interstate-commerce law?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I do not know that I understand the gentleman's question. I will ask him to make it as brief as he can.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. One of your people said yesterday that the Panama Canal would completely wipe out this age-long struggle between the coast cities and the interior points over the difference in rates against the interior points, whereas it seems to me that the inevitable result will be greatly to intensify that struggle.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If the gentleman means to ask whether or not it will intensify the struggle for the reduction of freight rates between the railroads and the ships that run through the Panama Canal, my reply to him is that that is what we want.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Why are the Pacific coast cities in the Supreme Court of the United States to-day fighting the long-and-short-haul clause, fighting the decisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission in the back-haul cases, fighting Spokane and Reno and similar inland points?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I am not arguing these cases in the Supreme Court.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. They are doing it, are they not?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I do not know what they are doing, and whatever the fact may be about that it has no relation to the argument which I am making.

Now, I want to answer about the interior not being benefited by the reduction of rates; we know that water and rail rates by the isthmus are made now as far west as Indianapolis and as far north as St. Louis in competition with the railroads. If you lower the water rate when you go through the Panama Canal, as must be the case, then you open up this territory in the Middle West to a market they have never had before. The products from the Pacific coast will then go up into this portion of the country, into places where they have never been before; and on the other hand you take the people who manufacture in Pittsburgh and Cleveland and all that great manufacturing country, they can get their product out to the Pacific coast for less than they ever did before.

Free tolls means free competition. It means free commerce. All sections of the country will be benefited by the canal, and all sections should bear the burden of its construction and maintenance.

When you say that if you reduce the freight rates on the coast of the United States that the rates in the interior will not be reduced, you might just as well say that if you reduce the level of the water along the edges of a great lake that the interior of the lake will not be reduced. One is to dispute the law of gravitation; the other is to dispute the law of trade. So that while trade will continue between the coasts the people in the Middle West will get lower rates and new markets.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I wish the gentleman would allow me to interrupt him again.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Very well.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Speaking as one from the interior, I do not pretend that we will not benefit in some measure by the construction of the Panama Canal, but the gentleman and every Member present knows that for years the railroads have charged and claimed the right to charge a higher rate to interior points than to water points, and the courts of this country have permitted them so to do by nullifying the long-and-short-haul clause of the interstate-commerce law and recognizing the claim that the railroads had to make the higher rates in order to sustain the losses they met at the water points. Now, then, the gentleman, notwithstanding the great reductions that will be made in the cost of coastwise transportation through the canal, wants the little additional amount of reduction that will come from free tolls to be paid in part by the people of the interior country, who have put up with these unduly high rates all these years.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman from Colorado yield to me now? [Laughter.]

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. If the gentleman will answer my proposition, I will yield gladly, and I will not ask him another question. [Laughter.]

Mr. WARBURTON. If the gentleman from Washington will pardon me, I would like to have the gentleman from Colorado suggest wherein that theory has ever been advanced in any court, as he states.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I am arguing the question presented here and not the questions in court with which I am not familiar.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Referring to the troubles of Reno and other thickly populated parts of the western country——

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Oh, Portland is fighting Spokane, and——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I thought the gentleman from Colorado agreed not to ask another question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would like to have the House and the gentleman from Colorado know what the Boston Chamber of Commerce reported three years ago. You gentlemen from the West, whose railroads were built largely of capital coming out of the East, ought to know it. In New England to-day, according to the Boston Chamber of Commerce, presumed to be one of the best-posted commercial institutions in the country, the coal bill is $100,000,000 per annum, and the actual value of that coal at the mines is $30,000,000 per annum. The freight paid for the limited railroad facilities to get that coal into New England is the remaining $70,000,000 per annum, which means that the man who works in New England has to pay a little more freight in proportion to the facilities for getting fuel and raw material than does the man in Reno. I thank the gentleman from Washington for giving me this opportunity.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. It seems it makes a difference on which side a gentleman makes a speech in the time of the gentleman from Washington. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I merely wanted to show that if you have troubles in Reno, there are troubles also along the east coast, where improved canals and waterways might help us.

THE REPORT.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I desire to call attention to one of two statements made in the report. In many respects this report is the most remarkable that has been filed by a great committee since I have been a Member of this House. I refer solely to that part that is devoted to canal tolls. This portion of the report seems to have been prepared for the express purpose of trying to conceal the facts by fervid denunciation and lurid adjectives. This part of the report sounds like the harangue of a professional agitator, delivered from a soap box on the street corner. By attacking and denouncing the imaginary ships that may go through the canal, by repeating over and over again the word "subsidy," the majority attempts to conceal from the public that canal tolls means largely to hand over this great work to the railroads for their use and benefit. It may not be assumed that the committee are as ignorant of our navigation laws as this report would indicate. Again and again it is attempted to show that free tolls would be solely for the benefit of the ships that might pass through the canal. Yet after repeating this statement time and time again the committee makes this solemn assertion as if they had discovered a new and great truth:

> We found from the hearings that the coastwise ships which will pass through the canal do not need the remission of the tolls.

Who ever disputed this fact? The committee did not, however, have the courage to add what is self-evident, that free tolls would not benefit the ships in the coastwise trade which will pass through the canal. Who ever contended that it was necessary for coastwise ships to have free tolls? No shipowner ever did. No one, so far as I know, has ever so testified. No man, so far as I know, has ever been guilty of making a contention so stupid.

Surely it can not be seriously contended by full-grown men that a fact had been discovered that anyone disputed when they said that they had found that the ships in the coastwise trade going through the canal did not need free tolls.

But when they made this statement the majority destroyed every argument that they had made against tolls, for their sole argument has been that free tolls would be a subsidy paid to coastwise ships going through the canal. So long as our coastwise laws remain unchanged it is a matter of indifference to the ships that pass through the canal whether they are charged tolls or not.

This is the testimony of every shipowner that has spoken upon the subject. This is common sense so plain that none will dispute it. This trade is reserved for American ships. If one ship pays a toll, so does the other. All ships are kept on an equality. The matter of tolls does not concern the coastwise ship in the least. It is simply added to freights, and the people pay it. When the ship adds it to the freight the railroad also adds it to the freight on every ton of similar products that they carry. Here lies the fundamental objection to canal tolls. It is not so much the remission of the tolls that go through the canal as it is a remission of a part of the freight on similar traffic carried by the railroads. Tolls are not a burden upon the ship that carries the products, but upon the consumer and the producer.

Many times in this report in sophomorical language the majority cries out that to give free tolls would be an unjust discrimination and a great injustice to 90 per cent of our coastwise vessels that now run up and down our coasts but will not use the canal. Listen how anxious and solicitous they are about the railroad-owned ships in the coastwise trade:

> Ninety per cent of the coastwise ships, busy all the time in interstate business, will never approach the canal at all. Less than 10 per cent of all these coastwise ships will use the canal, making long journeys, charging correspondingly more freight and passenger rates, and making infinitely more money, yet it is selfishly demanded that those few ships—for only a few will be needed—shall be given their tolls in the interests of interstate trade, while the 90 per cent rendering service just as valuable in interstate commerce would not participate in the contribution.

If the argument of the majority be true, all the coastwise vessels are now participating in a subsidy. Every coastwise vessel receives a subsidy when it runs into one of our subsidized harbors. Why should not a coastwise ship stop and pay tolls to reimburse the Government for improving the harbors it uses? If remission of tolls is a subsidy, then every vessel that goes through the Soo Canal receives a subsidy. Why should these vessels not stop and remit to the Government the money it has expended to construct this canal? Why should this canal be free and the Panama Canal charge tolls? We have subsidized the Mississippi River and its tributaries in a greater amount than we will expend for the construction of the Panama Canal. And all these many millions have been expended for politics more than for the benefit of navigation.

If remission of tolls is a subsidy, then every vessel running on our interior rivers is receiving a subsidy. Why does not some subsidy hater, some railroad despiser, some special-privilege denouncer, some self-proclaimed protector of the people rise and exercise his privileges and his vocabulary in demanding that the Government be repaid this vast subsidy that is given to the 90 per cent of the American vessels now running in our coastwise trade and upon our lakes and rivers? Why are the majority so strenuously against a subsidy, if remission of tolls be a subsidy, for the few ships that may pass through the canal and so tenderly solicitous about giving the 90 per cent of American vessels that never will go through the canal a subsidy? Far be it from me to suggest that this pathetic cry for justice repeated time and time again in the majority report for the 90 per cent that now receive a subsidy, if remission of tolls is a subsidy, is in the least degree inspired by the fact that most of this 90 per cent that now receive a subsidy belong to the railroads of the country, and that the 10 per cent that may hereafter go through the canal may not belong to the railroads. It is always a credit to men to desire to protect the weak and defenseless, and the majority of the committee should be honored for defending the defenseless and helpless railroad-owned vessels and seeing that they are not discriminated against by private-owned vessels in this hour of their extreme peril.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I have only a short time; yes.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Since the gentleman is so anxious to save American ships this little item of toll, why does not he say a word for the American ships in the foreign trade and get them a little help from the Government? Why does he not say a word for them?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I did say a good many words on the floor of the House in favor of American ships, but according to my recollection the gentleman from New York was opposed to assisting them.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. No; I was not opposed to it, because they need it and the coastwise ships do not need it.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. They do not need it, and are not asking for it, and they do not want it.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. They were before the committee, and were asking for it like beggars.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Name one.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Dearborn.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. He expressly said that he did not care for tolls.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. He was there.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. And I challenge the gentleman now to stand on the floor of this House and point in the hearings to a single shipowner who asks for tolls, or anybody else.

Mr. MONDELL. They did not have the nerve.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. They did not have the nerve to ask for what they did not want, and they would not go there and write themselves down as being so stupid.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Then what did they appear there for—the people of California and from the gentleman's part of the country—unless they were for it?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The people from my country appeared there and asked the committee to give us some competition between the railroads and the ships that will run through the canal. [Applause.]

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. I will admit they said they were going to shift all of the benefit to the people, but I know they would not, any more than the railroads would. Do you suppose that they would pass over that 50 cents a ton to the common people throughout the country?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Oh, we know what it is on the Pacific coast to be at the mercy of railroads without competition, and we thought that when we dug the canal that at last we were going to get some competition, some release from the railroad monopoly.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Oh, you want the benefit of it all.

Mr. DOREMUS and Mr. MONDELL rose.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I can not yield to the gentleman at present. I will yield to a member of the committee.

Mr. DOREMUS. Will the gentleman permit me to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL] one question—a short question? [Laughter.]

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I would, but you would get into an argument and take up my time.

Mr. DOREMUS. Oh, no; I would not. I will ask the gentleman from New York if he will vote for an amendment to this bill providing for free tolls for American vessels engaged in foreign trade?

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Why, certainly; I would vote for a subsidy large enough to pay it, but not directly for free tolls.

Mr. DOREMUS. You will?

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. And I will vote for more than that. I have always voted for subsidies for our American vessels that were trying to get some headway, to get some foothold in foreign trade. The gentleman from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] wants to strike down the one steamship company now engaged in foreign trade—the American-Hawaiian Co. He wants to drive it out of business and give more to these coastwise companies that have a complete monopoly now.

TOLLS A BURDEN ON COMMERCE.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. We are informed by the majority of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce that a reasonable toll upon domestic trade is not a burden; that a small toll upon commerce does not make any difference in the freight rates; that it will be absorbed by the carriers; and that it will make no difference to the producer or the consumer. A good deal of space is taken up by the committee trying to demonstrate the correctness of this argument. That is trying to show that two and two under certain circumstances do not make four, or, in other words, the committee would have you believe that if you can only make enough noise while you are doing it, that it is perfectly easy to perform the ancient trick of lifting yourself over the fence by your own boot straps. When you consider that the Panama Canal is owned and controlled by the Government and that no private monopoly of the canal can exist, and then say that tolls upon the coastwise traffic, however small, is not a burden upon commerce, then you say that a tax is not a burden upon the people. If the argument of the committee is true and 40 cents a ton is not a burden upon commerce, then is 50 cents a ton a burden? If 50 cents a ton will still be absorbed by the carrier and is not a burden upon commerce, will a dollar a ton be? If not, just where does the burden begin? At just what point does the transportation company begin to shift the burden from themselves and make it show in the freight rate? Just where does the carrier shift the burden from himself to the consumer? If the argument of the majority is sound, then we should tax all our transportation companies, both by land and sea, because it would not affect the rates which would be paid entirely by the companies and not by the people. If their argument is true, then we should tax the vast tonnage of the Great Lakes that passes through the Soo Canal, because such tax would be no burden upon commerce. It would be paid entirely by the ships going through the canal. It would be no burden upon the people and it would repay the Government the millions it has spent and is still spending in constructing and operating that canal.

If the argument of the majority of the committee is correct we should at once place an enormous tonnage tax on all our oversea traffic, for it would all be absorbed by the ships that carry the trade. It would not be a burden upon the people. It would not affect freight rates, and in this instance at least we would make the foreigner pay something to the United States in return for the millions that this Government has spent in improving our rivers and harbors, mostly for the benefit of these foreign ships.

A tax, says the majority, is no burden upon the people. It is borne directly and solely by the interests upon which it is laid. This argument is radiant with hope and promise to us all, for if it is true then all the burdens of government should be borne by the great interests upon which the taxes are laid and the people pay nothing. If the argument of the majority of the committee upon this proposition is correct then anyone who possesses a dollar can soon become a millionaire by changing it often enough from one pocket to the other. It is hard to argue seriously a proposition so absurd as that a toll is not a charge upon commerce. Every charge and every toll of every kind and description upon commerce is a burden. The very statement of this proposition demonstrates the truth. Every toll laid upon traffic through the canal is an obstruction to commerce. Make this toll high enough and you as completely obstruct the Panama Canal as if you were to permanently close one of the great gates of the giant locks. And every rate, from the lowest to the complete closing of the canal, is just that much of an obstruction. It interferes to that extent with commerce. It interferes to that extent with the fullest use of the canal. In other words, it takes from those who own the canal just that much benefit. Every charge that is made on an American vessel in the coastwise trade passing through the canal, whether that charge be great or small, will eventually show itself in the freight rate and will eventually be paid by the American people. The amount of the charge will make no difference in the certainty and the sureness of the result. With a mind that deceives itself with the delusion that a tax, however small, is not a burden upon commerce and eventually borne by the people it is useless to argue. It is worse than a waste of words to attempt to convince anyone who holds such views, for such mind is beyond improvement and has absorbed more than earthly wisdom.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes; I yield now to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman argues that the tolls will be reflected in the rates. I have not heard any part of his argument that substantiates that. That is his statement. If that is true, would it not help also if, in addition to expending $400,000,000 for building the canal and several millions for maintaining it, we also furnish coal free to these vessels while they go through? And if we furnish them free tolls, why not give them free coal? And why should we not also pay the wages of the sailors from coast to coast?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Of course, the gentleman sees the sophistry of his argument. It is such that it does not need an answer. The question is this: Why are you going to make a different rule in regard to the Panama Canal from what you do in regard to other waterways? Why do you place the burden upon all of the people in respect to the other waterways of the country and then in the case of the Panama Canal make an exception?

Mr. MONDELL. Is the gentleman in favor of making the Panama Canal free to all traffic as all of the other waterways are free?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Why, Mr. Chairman, I am surprised at the gentleman. Does the gentleman mean to tell me that all of our waterways are free for foreign ships?

Mr. MONDELL. I never heard they were not.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I can tell the gentleman that he is very much mistaken.

Mr. MONDELL. Why are they not?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Because we make them pay for them. That is why.

Mr. MONDELL. In what way do they pay for the use of the harbor of New York?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. In the way of tonnage tax, pilotage charges, and various other charges.

Mr. MONDELL. They pay exactly what the domestic ships pay.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The gentleman is again mistaken.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman would not mind another question, why should an American ship between San Francisco and New York be given an advantage over an American ship between New York and Valparaiso?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Have I advocated that?

Mr. MONDELL. That is the gentleman's proposition.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The difference is simply this, if the gentleman will permit me, because the trade between this coast and the east coast is domestic traffic.

Mr. MONDELL. It is a monopoly, and you give the benefit to the American shipowners competing with all the world, and would not give the advantage——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I have never said anything of the kind. I do not believe it; I am not in favor of it. Now, the gentleman will please not put anything in my mouth I have not said.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman said he is in favor of giving the American ships free tolls, no matter where they go.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. That is the gentleman's position?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It is. Is that plain enough?

Mr. MONDELL. I would ask the gentleman, now, to give us the reasons, which he has not suggested up to this time.

Mr. MALBY. Will the gentleman give way for a question?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I can not yield now.

Mr. MONDELL. But does the gentleman think under the terms——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I do not want to be discourteous, but I refuse to yield to anybody until I have finished.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; I can not.

TREATIES.

Our treaties in relation to the canal is the wall behind which the committee seeks to protect itself from public condemnation in attempting to use the canal for the use and benefit of the railroads. The majority of the committee would have you believe that we can not charge tolls without violating our solemn treaty obligation, placing deep-toned emphasis on the "solemn." Who contends that a free canal would violate our treaties? The railroad attorneys. Anyone else? Yes; some of the foreign shipping nations, our commercial rivals, after being prompted by the railroads, have made this claim. Has anyone else? If so, it has not been made public. What great legal mind appeared before the committee and gave such an opinion? What authorities have been cited? As no interest has asked for tolls except the railroads, so no one in this country has urged the treaties as an obstacle for a free canal except the railroads. Yet the committee tells us that the interest of the people imperatively demands that we charge tolls upon our own ships, and that the sacred honor of the Nation would be violated if we did not charge our own vessels the same that we charge the vessels of other nations. This eagerness to favor other nations at the expense of our own country under pretense of the treaties is so transparent as to almost challenge the good faith of the committee.

If you will take the facts surrounding the treaty and the wording of the treaty itself, it is clear that it was the intention of the makers of that treaty that the United States could do as she wished with her own ships, both in the foreign and in the domestic trade. All that the treaty means or ever was intended to mean was that the United States should treat all other nations alike. If the treaty had intended that we should charge our own vessels the same as we charge the vessels of other nations, it would have so stated in plain and unequivocal language. There is ample precedent for believing this. This is the usual language used in our treaties in relation to shipping made with other nations. Why, then, was it not used in this most important treaty? In the treaties which we have with other nations in regard to our port charges the language is:

> That no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States.

There can be no mistaking this language. Why was it not employed in the making of our treaty with reference to the canal if we so intended? These treaties and this language was undoubtedly familiar to those who negotiated the treaty. Then, why was it not used? There could be, there is, but one reason: Because it was not intended that the United States should not use the canal, so far as our own ships were concerned, as she pleases. As the United States was to build the canal, pay for it, own it, operate it, and defend it, it was intended that the United States should use it as her own, and that is the language of the treaty. The treaty says that the United States shall "enjoy all the rights incident to such construction." What are those rights? We need not stop to give them all, but the most important of all these rights was that of using the canal for the use of her ships. If that right is not one of the "incidents to construction," for what purpose did we build the canal? The United States agreed to this and to this only: That she would treat all other nations—not as she treated herself but all other nations—"on terms of entire equality."

Mr. MONDELL. Now will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; I can not. I will not yield until I have finished.

No one ever dreamed of placing any other construction on the treaty until the railroads, defeated in their attempt to prevent the building of the canal, raised this question to destroy the result of its construction.

The language of the treaty is as follows:

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

If it was intended that the vessels of the United States should pay the same as the vessels of other nations, especially in view of the fact that it was to construct and own the canal, certainly it would have so stated. The most strained construction of the wording of this section does not bear out the contention that we can not use the canal without charge so far as our own vessels are concerned. In fact, the majority of the committee convict themselves of inconsistency if not insincerity when they make this contention, for they themselves propose by this bill to admit vessels "of war" owned by this country through the canal free, and yet the treaty says "vessels of commerce and of war."

And still the committee contends that the treaty would be violated by admitting free vessels of commerce and not of war, when exactly the same provision is made in the treaty with reference to vessels of each class. They attempt in vain to explain this difference in their report, but it is an explanation that does not explain.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; I can not.

But I confess that all things are possible to any mind that can conceive that this Nation would, under any circumstances, even in the least degree consult other nations in regard to her domestic affairs, and yet the majority of the committee contends that we can not even exempt from tolls ships in the coastwise trade, a trade with which foreign nations have nothing whatever to do. I have yet to hear of any legal mind that makes such contention. Even the committee did not have the courage to rely upon the treaties for imposing tolls in the coastwise trade, but sought various other pretexts to justify them for placing this tax upon domestic commerce.

There can be no discrimination against any man in the conduct of any business in which he has no part and can not have any part. No nation can claim that it is discriminated against in a trade in which it is not engaged and in which it can not engage. This is axiomatic. So far as the coastwise trade is concerned the Supreme Court of the United States has already settled the question in the case of Olsen v. Smith (195 U. S., 332). The Supreme Court has squarely decided that it can not be in violation of our treaty to give free tolls in the coastwise trade. In that case the Supreme Court was construing the treaty to which I have heretofore referred, in which the language was:

That no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States.

It will be noted that the language here is much stronger than that of the Panama Canal treaty. Yet the Supreme Court decided in that case that it was not discriminating against a British vessel for this country to charge a British vessel a tonnage tax for coming into a port where American vessels engaged in the coastwise trade were admitted free.

The language of Mr. Justice White, now Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court, upon this subject in that case is explicit and conclusive, and is as follows:

Neither the exemption of coastwise vessels from pilotage resulting from any law of the United States nor any lawful exemption of coastwise vessels created by the State law concerns vessels in the foreign trade, and therefore any such exemptions do not operate to produce a discrimination against British vessels engaged in foreign trade and in favor of vessels of the United States in such trade. In substance the proposition but asserts that because by the law of the United States steam vessels in the coastwise trade have been exempt from pilotage regulations therefore there is no power to subject vessels in foreign trade to pilotage regulations, even although such regulations apply without discrimination to all vessels engaged in such foreign trade, whether domestic or foreign.

The majority of the committee say that this case is not in point. They could say nothing else. It is significant that they neither attempt to answer the argument nor to explain why it does not apply. The lone assertion that it is not in point has little weight and carries little conviction when no reason is given for making the assertion. That a case is not in point is the only reply that is left for a lawyer to make when he denounces a decision so plain and so clearly in point that it destroys his case. This statement on behalf of an attorney is always an admission that the case is decisive and against him. This is the answer of the majority, because it was the only one that could be made. Suppose that we had said in our treaty in relation to Panama that we would not charge other vessels "higher or other duties" than we should charge "vessels of the United States" for using the canal, that language would have been immeasurably stronger than the language of the treaty, and yet under exactly that language our coastwise trade could still go through the canal free without violating the treaty either in letter or in spirit. The coastwise trade is our own trade. It is our domestic commerce, and what we do regarding it, as Judge White points out, does not in any way concern foreign nations and does not in any way discriminate against them.

Let us be fair and not attempt to deceive either ourselves or the people in regard to this question. If you believe that tolls should be imposed so that the canal may be self-supporting, then say so. If you believe that tolls should be imposed so that the coasts shall bear more than their portion of the burden because they are more greatly benefited, then say so. If you believe that it would not be to the best interests of this country to have complete and unobstructed competition between the railroads and the ships going through the canal, then say so.

But if you expect the American people to have faith in your sincerity when you say that our treaties prevent free tolls from being given to our domestic trade, then you are doomed to find that you are greatly mistaken. No nation of the world other than the United States would for a moment entertain the suggestion that we did not have the right under existing conditions to make the canal absolutely free for any vessel, either of commerce or of war, that flies the American flag. Imagine, if you can, England or Germany or Japan building a canal, paying for it, controlling it, and then refusing to use it for their own commercial advantage and stopping to ask the other nations of the world whether they had the power to run their own ships through their own canal without paying themselves tolls. It is beyond comprehension that any one of these nations would think of placing a burden upon their own commerce. Can you imagine a member of the legislative body of one of these great commercial nations under such circumstances standing up and under the pretext of such a treaty arguing against the interests of his own country? Would he not at least leave that task for others? Nowhere except beneath the Dome of this Capitol is such spectable possible—so plainly indefensible and so astonishingly unpatriotic. No nation would have had the assurance when the treaty was being negotiated to have said to us, "You build the canal, you pay for it, you operate it, you defend it, you protect it, and then admit us to use it on exactly the same terms that you use it yourself." Such a proposition is inconceivable to any normal mind. It is little short of a national scandal that Congress now proposes to cowardly surrender the benefits of the canal. By doing this we admit to the other nations of the world that we lack either the courage or the intelligence to care for the interests of our own country.

FREE TOLLS ARE NOT A DIRECT BENEFIT TO AMERICAN SHIPS IN THE COASTWISE TRADE.

It is perfectly clear that a free canal for coastwise trade would be a benefit to commerce, but not in particular to ships that would carry that commerce. As I have before said, if tolls are imposed upon one ship they are imposed upon another, so that an exact equality is maintained between all ships that would pass through the canal. Yet, for the sake of the argument, admit that tolls on coastwise trade would be only making a private industry—that is, American ships—pay for using a public canal. Why should this be done? One of the great purposes of the canal is a military one. They tell us that it will double the efficiency of our Navy, a statement which, I think, is very far from the fact; but, if it is true, why should a single industry be compelled to bear the burden of the canal that was constructed primarily for the common defense? Would it not be as just to select any other single industry and compel it to support the Government? Why not, then, select some other single industry and compel it to support half the expense of the Army? When the canal is completed it will be part of our coast line, which will be on the south what the Great Lakes are to-day on the north. Why charge vessels for the use of the canal on our southern border any more than we charge for the use of the canal on our northern border? Why should we charge ships for the use of the Panama Canal any more than we should charge for using the Mississippi River? We have already spent more millions in improving the Mississippi River and its tributaries than we have spent in the construction of the Panama Canal, and as the years go by we will spend more millions to continue the improvement of the great waterways of the Mississippi Valley than we will to maintain and operate the Panama Canal. Why, then, should we not charge the vessels that use these rivers, improved at Government expense, tolls if we are to charge tolls for the use of the Panama Canal? In each and all of these improvements of our rivers and harbors we were inspired by the same purpose that we were in building the Panama Canal, so far as commerce is concerned, and that was to reduce the cost of transportation.

There is a great fleet of vessels on the Great Lakes. They use a canal built and owned and operated by the Government at the cost of many millions. Why should not this great fleet of vessels, owned mostly by the railroads, pay a toll for using this canal? There is but one consistent answer that can be made to these questions, but this answer no man who favors placing a toll upon ships passing through the Panama Canal dare make, and that consistent answer, which is the real answer, is this: That the railroads of the country own or control practically all the regular lines of steamships that use all the waterways of this Nation, and thereby the railroads are enabled to fix freight rates and prevent competition. The railroads fear that they will not be able to control the Panama Canal; that they will not be able to monopolize this waterway; that there may be some real competition, so they desire to lessen this competition as much as possible by having tolls charged, and the higher it is the better it will suit the railroads. And this is the real reason why there is a demand for tolls to-day. You let it be known that the railroads of this country own and control the lines of steamships that will be operated through the canal in the coastwise trade and all objection to a free canal for domestic trade will disappear within 24 hours.

FOREIGN SHIPS IN THE COASTWISE TRADE.

Free tolls, while they would not benefit the ships that go through the canal in the coastwise trade for the reasons already stated, they would greatly benefit American shipping. Free tolls would add to the amount of commerce that would go through the canal in the coast-to-coast trade, and would thereby necessarily increase the American tonnage and the number of American ships. The greatest and most beneficial effect upon American shipping that free tolls would have would be that it would establish the policy of the Nation in relation to the toll question, and it would be a guaranty to the American people that the coast-to-coast trade would be reserved to American ships. As it now is, the American citizen wishing to buy ships does not know what the policy will be. He hesitates to place his orders in American yards because he fears that eventually he may have as his competitors either foreign ships flying foreign flags or foreign built ships running under the American flag. His fears are well founded.

Already a bill has been reported to this House giving to foreign-built ships every privilege of the canal that shall be given to American-built ships engaged in the foreign trade. Should this bill become a law and much foreign tonnage be purchased by American citizens and Congress still hesitate to give American ships in the coastwise trade free tolls, few American ships will be built for the use of the canal. And some day, not far distant, the canal will be ready for use and there will be no American ships to use it, traffic will be waiting to be transported, and immediately there will be an insistent demand that foreign-built ships be admitted to this trade. We know by experience with the Philippines that this is true. We know that Congress could not resist the demand then, and it would not long resist, in all probability, the demand that would be made for foreign-built ships through the canal. This proposition to admit foreign ships to the coastwise trade already has many advocates in Congress, both in the House and in the Senate. Herein lies the greatest menace of all in the proposition to impose canal tolls and in the delay of Congress in declaring for discrimination in favor of American ships. Most other mistakes if we made them could and would soon be remedied, but if once foreign ships are admitted to coastwise trade it would be a great national calamity that we would not soon remove. The admission of foreign ships to the coastwise trade means not only the destruction of our great shipbuilding industry by making desolate places of our shipyards, of the complete disappearance of our flag from the sea, but it would also place us completely at the mercy of foreign nations, not only in matters of commerce, but also in time of war. It would make us as helpless and as subservient to the will of other nations as China has been for the past century.

The foreign steamship combine and the transcontinental railroads of this country, the two most powerful influences and monopolies in the world, are working together toward this common end—the admission of foreign ships to the coastwise trade. Why is this true? Because they have a common interest. One desires to do the carrying and the other wishes to avoid competition.

It is a fact to-day, denied by no one, that all the foreign steamship lines of the world engaged in over-seas trade belong to rings, pools, conferences, and combines that fix rates and prevent competition. The rate that every passenger and that every pound of freight must pay to-day that goes from our ports to the other ports of the world beyond the sea is fixed in advance by agreement. In the fixing of these rates American interests are not represented and American interests are not considered. There is no competition whatever between the vessels of foreign nations engaged in the deep-sea trade.

Foreign vessels to-day completely dominate the commerce of the oceans, and they have but one rule that regulates the rates that they charge, and that is the old rule of "all the traffic will bear." These foreign steamship combines have at least a "gentlemen's" understanding with our railroads, and they always have had. This combine of foreign ships largely controls freight rates even upon the railroads in this country. All these facts are known to-day by everyone. The railroads are well aware of the fact that they would have no competition through the canal if foreign ships controlled this trade. The matter of fixing freight rates would be certain and easy. If foreign ships controlled the trade through the Panama Canal the rate would always be exactly the highest the interstate commerce would permit the transcontinental railroad to charge engaged in the same traffic. It is by no means a remote possibility that foreign nations will capture the coast-to-coast trade through the Panama Canal. This is the belief of the foreign steamship combine, and there is no better judge of the probabilities of the action of Congress than this great monopoly. No other interest in the world follows more closely the action of this body, and no other interests spend more money to influence public opinion than this same foreign steamship combination. As evidence of their belief that they will control this trade, foreign steamship lines are spending millions in the construction of ships for this purpose and in the purchase of new terminals in this country largely based upon this hope. Judging by their actions the foreign shipowner has more hope of the coastwise trade being destroyed than does the American shipowner that it will be preserved. One of the leading railroad and shipping men in America told me a few days ago that he felt absolutely certain that with the opening of the Panama Canal would come the admission of foreign ships into the coastwise trade. Under such circumstances can you expect American citizens to buy American ships in anticipation of the opening of the canal? If Congress will promptly declare for a free canal for American ships immediately our yards will be busy constructing ships for this trade, and however much that trade may prove to be, sufficient American ships will be found to carry it.

Here is an opportunity to largely restore the American flag to the sea, and it will not cost the American people a single dollar, but, on the contrary, by doing it we will save to the American consumer and the American producer countless millions.

TOLLS SHOULD NOT BE LEVIED TO PAY THE EXPENSE OF OPERATING THE CANAL.

One argument for tolls upon the canal is that it is a great public work, built at Government expense, and that the traffic passing through it should be taxed to help pay the cost of maintenance. Those who make this argument treat the canal as if it were a private proposition, built for private gain. Herein lies the foundation of their error. They forget that the canal is a public achievement, built by the public for the public benefit. When you place a toll on domestic trade you take it in the first instance from one industry—in this case shipping. This industry adds this toll to the freight, and this is again paid by the consumer, so that all that is accomplished is the cost of collecting and again disbursing what the people in any event must pay; but by this circuitous way the burden is increased instead of lessened.

A firm in my State bought a large tract of timber some distance from Puget Sound, and in order to move this timber economically to tidewater they built a railroad of several miles in length for this purpose. According to the opinion of those who claim that the Panama Canal should pay for itself this logging firm lost a large amount of money in the operation of their railroad. They showed a lack of business judgment. They should have erected a number of stations along this line and placed men in charge and have compelled traffic that went over this road to pay so much per ton in order to make the road pay for its construction and operation. At least they should have made it pay running expenses. This same firm again showed lack of business judgment because another logging company having a large tract of timber in that neighborhood was permitted to haul their logs over the railroad owned by the other firm. The firm that owned the railroad made the absurd and unexplainable mistake of charging their neighbor for the use of this railroad and at the same time did not charge themselves for using their own property.

The gentlemen who are urging canal tolls in order to benefit the people ought to go into the logging business and build a railroad, and they would soon become millionaires by charging themselves as much for using their own property as they charge their neighbors for making the same use of it. The proposition to charge canal tolls is just as absurd and lacks as much of sound economic judgment as would that of the logging firm if it had charged itself for using its own railroad which it had constructed at its own expense. If a charge must be made for using the canal, then let that charge be borne by the ships of foreign nations. Why should not these foreign ships bear the entire burden of the canal so far as its commercial advantages are concerned? Foreign nations have paid nothing for the construction of the canal. They will pay nothing for its maintenance. They will pay nothing to defend it. If war ever comes and it is necessary to protect the canal, the United States will have to bear that burden alone. Why should not American vessels go free through the canal and foreign vessels pay the expense of its maintenance. So far as has yet been shown by any expert a reasonable toll upon foreign vessels alone would pay for the operation and the maintenance of the canal. Why should any American citizen object to this being done?

WHAT THE PEOPLE EXPECTED.

It was the hope and the belief of the American people that the completion of the canal would be the commencement of building up a great commerce between the two coasts to the benefit of the entire country. It was hoped that freight rates in domestic commerce everywhere upon land and sea would be reduced. It was hoped that at last we would in one trade at least have real competition between rail and water. It was hoped that after the expenditure of many millions that the complete control of the domestic commerce of this Nation, both on land and sea, by the railroads would be broken, but if tolls are to be imposed these purposes will be largely defeated. The people will find that they have spent their money principally for the benefit of foreign nations and for the enrichment of transcontinental railways.

Remember that when by the imposition of tolls you increase the freight rates upon any commodity through the canal you at the same time in the same amount increase the freight rates upon that commodity that is carried by the railroads, or, in other words, when you increase the freight rate by canal tolls upon water-borne traffic you to the same extent increase the freight rate upon all similar traffic carried by the railroads. To illustrate, suppose the tolls imposed amount to a dollar per thousand upon lumber, then you add a dollar to the price of every thousand feet of lumber carried not only through the canal, but a dollar to the price of every thousand feet of lumber carried over land by the railroads. In other words, for every dollar you collect by placing a tax upon American ships that go through the canal and place in the National Treasury you collect a hundred dollars from the American consumer and put it into the treasury of the railroads. Suppose by canal tolls you collect a hundred thousand dollars a year upon lumber for the benefit of the United States Treasury, you at the same time enable the railroads to collect a million dollars from the American people for the benefit of themselves. We should not lose sight of this primal fact that when we increase the canal rates we increase the land rates. Suppose you increase the tolls on the Panama Canal upon canned salmon until it increases the cost of a case of salmon a dollar. You take a dollar for every case that goes through the Panama Canal and put it in the National Treasury, but you thereby permit the railroads to collect a dollar from every case of canned salmon that is shipped by the railroads and put it in their own treasury.

And all this money that goes into the National Treasury and all that goes to the railroads is paid by the consumer and the producer. So even if you admit that canal tolls are for the benefit of the people in order to get a hundred dollars for them you permit the railroads to get a thousand dollars for themselves. The railroads know that this is true. The great commercial bodies of the country know that this is true. The people of the country know that this is true. Everybody knows that this is true except the majority of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the House of Representatives, and even they will discover it when the people have had an opportunity to reason with them.

The chairman of the committee, Mr. ADAMSON, in a speech yesterday afternoon made a sarcastic reflection upon the commercial bodies that have declared in favor of a free canal, but I notice he did not produce any resolutions passed by any commercial body of this country condemning it, and, so far as I am informed, there is but one commercial body in the United States that declared against a free canal.

I close this argument as I began. This is the case of the People v. The Railroads. Never since I have been a Member of Congress has there been such a transparent and indefensible attempt to legislate in behalf of any great private interest, without regard to the public welfare, as has been displayed in the bill that has been reported to the House proposing that in the use of the Panama Canal ships flying the American flag shall be taxed the same as those flying a foreign flag. Shall we have competition between the steamship lines running between the two coasts and the transcontinental railroads? Shall our commerce be increased and our freight rates lowered? Shall we have dug the canal for the benefit of the American people who have paid for it and own it and must protect it, or shall we have expended all these millions for the benefit of other nations and for the benefit of the railroads? This is the question that we must answer to the American people by our votes upon this bill. [Applause.]

I insert an article on the subject of canal tolls by Gen. H. M. Chittenden, one of the foremost engineers in the world and one of the clearest and ablest writers in the country, taken from the Forum for April, 1912. He states that it is as capable of demonstration as any principle in mathematics, that it is fallacious to place tolls upon domestic commerce. I commend to each Member of this House a careful reading of this argument:

THE CASE AGAINST PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

(Gen. H. M. Chittenden.)

If any railroad company or other business corporation should discover that a certain policy which it was pursuing was seriously curtailing its revenues, it would alter that policy unless there were controlling reasons why it could not do so. Now, it is a fact, as capable of demonstration as any fact in mathematics, that the levying of tolls upon our coastwise trade through the Panama Canal will produce this very effect so far as the people of the United States are concerned. It will cost more than it will come to. It will be worse than the folly of taking from one pocket to put into another. It will strike at the very root of utility of the great work itself.

Why do the public not see this? Precisely because the vast majority are victims of what a great philosopher has called "the illusion of the near." We are influenced, controlled, led by what is near at hand, by what we can actually see or hear or feel. We are too indifferent or too deficient in insight to reason upon things which lie beyond our immediate vision. We see revenue pouring in in dollars and cents enough to pay expenses and yield a substantial surplus. That is a definite, tangible fact—and a satisfying one. Why look further? Why inquire whether the policy pursued is doing all the good it should do, or possibly doing more harm than good? A bird in the hand, etc.

Now, with private enterprise, conducted according to the accepted standards of business ethics, this is sound argument. A net revenue sufficient to pay substantial dividends is pretty good evidence that a business is doing what was expected of it. Collateral relations are immaterial to the case. If indirect benefits flow to outsiders, they do not enter the calculation. If injury is being done, it most likely falls on competitors and may even be an apparent source of gain. This is accepted as good doctrine in private business; but it is a capital error, though one constantly committed, to apply this doctrine to public enterprise. The two are fundamentally different. Collateral or indirect results, which in private business can not ordinarily be taken account of at all, may be and often are more important in public enterprises than the direct results. This failure to discriminate between the two cases is the greatest handicap from which public work suffers to-day. It is one thing to say that a railroad company, if it is to succeed, must have a direct revenue in excess of all expenditures; it is a very different thing—in fact, a wholly erroneous principle—to apply any such rule to a great public work like the Panama Canal.

Yet this is precisely the argument which now seems to prevail in Congress; and, what is more remarkable, finds its inspiration in the Canal Zone itself. "Make the canal support itself and ultimately pay off its cost." Well and good so far. But—"Do this by means of tolls upon commerce passing through the canal." Absolutely fallacious and, in greater or less degree, according to the amount of the toll, destructive of the very ends for which the canal is being built. This remark is here applied specifically to the coastwise trade of the United States. The application of the principle to foreign commerce will be considered further on.

We said that this proposition as applied to Panama was as capable of demonstration as any principle in mathematics. This is true, even without taking account of certain indirect benefits which are themselves sufficient to justify the canal project, but which can never be made a definite source of revenue. Let us, however, refer to them in passing.

It is estimated by the Secretary of War that the effect of the canal in increasing the value of the Navy as defender of two coasts is nearly equivalent to an equal expenditure on the Navy itself if there were no canal. This may be a high estimate, but its value in this respect is certainly equivalent to an outlay on the Navy of not less than $200,000,000.

But the supreme and far-reaching influence of the canal will be upon the development of the country. There is no dissenting voice to the proposition that its beneficial influence will be felt in all sections, though, of course, more directly on the Pacific slope than elsewhere. A great barrier to the free movement of the world's commerce will have been removed. The rivers and canals of the East and the railroads leading in from the coasts will cooperate with the great water route to bring all sections of our broad land closer together and closer to our sister nations. Commodities which now find only limited markets because of the handicap of high freight rates will come into greater use. Immigration will pour into the Pacific States, that kind of immigration that is wanted, and the development of the whole country will be accelerated. No one can doubt this. We can not measure the magnitude of this movement in definite figures, but it will be the most important result of all growing out of the construction of the canal.

If the late Mr. Harriman had built the canal (as it is said that he intended to do if the Government did not) and had financed it in the usual way, he could not, of course, have given much weight to these indirect benefits. They would have been of no use in paying dividends. He could have looked no further than the ships actually passing through the canal, and upon every one of these, regardless of nationality or character of commerce, he would have levied tribute. But how different is the situation with the Government. Is it not altogether probable that, if it were never to collect a cent of revenue from the commerce passing through the canal, the indirect benefits resulting from that work would still justify the immense cost? In any event, is it not a logical absurdity to maintain that the only way in which the Government can be recouped for this outlay is by laying tolls upon commerce passing through the canal?

However, let us leave these matters out of consideration and take only the actual commerce passing through the canal, and let us consider the problem of making this commerce pay the cost and maintenance of that work. We purpose to demonstrate that the true solution of this problem lies in making the canal absolutely toll free, so far as our coastwise trade is concerned, and to this end we shall consider first the toll itself, and secondly its effect in restricting the volume of traffic through the canal.

There are two ways in which the cost of the canal can be met—one from the General Treasury and the other, in part at least, by tolls. In either case the burden falls ultimately upon the consumer of the luxuries or necessities of life. In the one case a large percentage comes from luxuries pure and simple (as distinguished from necessities); in the other it comes almost entirely from necessities—coal, lumber, grain, fruit, building material, and the manifold commodities whose price will be affected by the tribute exacted at Panama. There is no escape from this fact. The canal cost must in any event be paid by indirect taxation, and the fact that in one case it finds direct expression in the form of tolls collected does not alter the truth. Do not be victimized by the "illusion of the near." Do not imagine for a moment that by paying the cost of the canal from tolls collected you are lifting so much as one cent of the burden from the shoulders of the people. On the other hand, the most superficial analysis will show that a toll will impose that burden where it can least easily be borne. At the very best it is no better than taking from one pocket to put into another.

Consider, now, the effect of tolls upon the utility of the canal itself. In its commercial relations the purpose of the canal is to remove a great barrier to the movement of the world's trade. Manifestly the maximum value of the canal will come from the widest possible actual use made of it. Anything which restricts that use will limit the value of the work itself. Now, the direct effect of a toll is to restrict such use. It is perfectly conceivable that the toll might be so high as to form a barrier as effective as Culebra Hill itself. On the other hand, it is certain that with no toll the actual tonnage of traffic (or the true usefulness of the canal) will be at a maximum. Where between those two extremes the utility of the canal shall fall will depend upon the rate of toll imposed. The fact that the toll may be small does not alter the principle. A dollar a ton will keep millions of tons annually away from the canal and either prevent its transport altogether or throw it back on the railroads. In either case the public will suffer a direct loss. The canal is a conserver of energy. It enables results to be accomplished at less cost than without it. It is really a productive agent of immense force. Whatever restricts its use increases the cost of production and imposes a corresponding burden upon the people.

This same consideration is the foundation of the free public highway system in most civilized countries. The highway toll has given way to the logic of facts. Whatever is saved in public taxation through tolls on such traffic is more than lost in increased prices and restrictions of use. If it were possible to deduce from current experience any general rule of practice, it would seem to be that routes of traffic—whether purely artificial, like highways and canals, or partly artificial, like improved natural channels—are generally held free to public use where the user owns and operates the means of locomotion, but are generally subject to a toll where the public owns and operates the plant, as in the case of public ferries or railroads. But there is, of course, no absolute rule. The one thing that experience has demonstrated beyond peradventure is that a tribute laid on the use of the highway itself, whether land or water, costs more than it comes to.

It is scarcely necessary to add that it is this principle which underlies the policy of absolute freedom of traffic on all the river and harbor works of the United States. That policy, which is the growth of long experience, was formulated into legislation in the act of Congress of July 5, 1884, as follows: "No tolls or operating charges whatsoever shall be levied or collected upon any vessel or vessels, dredges, or other passing water craft through any canal or other work for the improvement of navigation belonging to the United States." This enactment was not paternalism. It did not originate from any desire to dole out charity to the people. It was based upon the practical consideration that all money gained in tolls would be lost somewhere else, and that much more would be lost through inevitable restriction upon the use of such works. The policy has proved as beneficent as it is wise. Take, for example, the great Sault Canal—greatest of all canals in the volume of commerce carried. The traffic which passes that canal enters the economic life of every citizen of the Republic. To impose tolls upon it would yield a direct revenue to the Government, it is true, but it would take far more from the people. Such a policy would result in loss, not gain.

We may now restate our two fundamental propositions on this Panama toll question: First, that tolls will not relieve the people of the burden of paying for the canal, but will place that burden where it can be least easily borne; second, that tolls will restrict the use actually made of the canal and will thus deprive the public of a portion of the legitimate fruitage of their sacrifice. In both cases the public will get the worst of it. So far as our coastwise trade is concerned, we should treat the Panama Canal exactly as we do the Sault Canal. There is absolutely no difference in principle.

Pacific-coast sentiment, in close touch with which this article has been prepared, is a unit that our coastwise trade be given free passage through the canal. To the people of this coast the canal holds out a hope which it would be difficult to overestimate. It means to a large degree the abolition of the barriers of mountain and river and vast distances which separate them from the rest of the world, and a nearer approach to those sources of supply and of population upon which the development of their country for a generation to come must largely depend. To see the fruition of their hopes so close only to be robbed of it by the erection of an artificial barrier in place of the natural one now almost removed would be to spread a black cloud of disappointment and resentment over this entire region.

To the Atlantic coast the question is of scarcely less importance. In its search for world markets the East will find nowhere else on the globe a better than on the Pacific coast. For there is an empire-building people sprung from its own loins—a people who do more work that counts, who will buy more per capita and produce more to sell in return, than an equal number of any foreign nation. It is the market best of all worth saving, best worth fostering. Here surely is a public question in the settlement of which the East and West should stand shoulder to shoulder on common ground.

The railroads may be consistent in their opposition on the ground of self-defense, but they are certainly shortsighted, if not entirely mistaken. Taking the railroads of the country as a whole, it is a question if the increased revenue due to local haul to and from the coasts will not more than overbalance the loss to the interior haul across the country. Whether this is so or not, the increased development of the country under the impetus of the canal, if left to its full and legitimate effects, will certainly more than make up any loss. The railroads should rise to a patriotic view of this question, laying aside their narrow traditional self-interest, and join hands with the rest of the country in securing to the people the utmost good of which the Panama Canal will be capable. It is no angry threat, but simply a candid warning that a contrary policy will exasperate public sentiment, rearouse suspicions of the past now happily somewhat allayed, lead to the renewal of antirailroad legislation, and hasten the day of Government ownership.

Let us now consider the question of foreign commerce. Do not the principles above laid down apply with equal force to that also? Unquestionably. But there is this countervailing fact, that foreign nations have borne no part of the cost of the canal, and ought therefore, in common equity, to pay something for the privilege of using it. There is no difference of opinion as to the justice of a reasonable charge for this privilege. This fact, however, does not relieve traffic of the evil effects of the toll system, which will certainly restrict the use of the canal, and thus diminish its value to the world at large. Is there any practical way to overcome this difficulty and at the same time compel the foreign user of the canal to bear his proper share of its cost?

The practice already followed by certain governments of rebating tolls on the Suez Canal is one method that suggests itself and one which would accomplish the purpose if generally applied. But if not generally applied it would produce all the evil effects of a discriminating tariff and would be far from realizing ideal freedom in the use of the canal. Moreover, it would not relieve the canal authorities or passing ships of the delay, annoyance, and expense of toll collections.

It has been suggested as an effective solution of the problem that an international convention be entered into whereby the canal should be made free to the world's commerce, each nation paying the United States yearly from its own treasury a sum proportionate to the commerce passing the canal under its own flag, the charge to be based upon the actual cost of maintenance and operation and such a percentage of the cost of construction as would pay off the debt within a specified period. This would be a strict interpretation of the principle of free use of river and harbor works as applied in the United States.

The problem is one which may well engage the attention of the world's best minds. The great principle to be kept constantly in view is that tolls mean restriction of use, and the restriction of use means less than the highest result. Some way should be found for making Panama and Suez as free to the world's commerce as if nature herself had excavated the channels, as free as are the Straits of Gibraltar or Magellan.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. Chairman, the great problem that is occupying the attention of the business world is the question of transportation. This Government in the creation of the Interstate Commerce Commission sought to regulate transportation over railroads, and in subsequent legislation amendatory of the interstate-commerce act has increased the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission to an extent not dreamed of by the authors of the original act, so that to-day the commission has power not only to pass upon the question of rebates, practices, and regulations of all descriptions, but also passes upon the sufficiency of rates, and has the right under the law to fix same. As a result of this legislation we have done away with unfair methods and have prohibited a condition of affairs whereby one shipper could be favored over another, thus placing every shipping concern and every railroad in the United States on an equal footing with the other. All of this has been of the greatest benefit to the railroads. It has stopped the giving of free transportation; it has stopped ruinous competition, and to-day no honestly conducted railroad would agree for a moment that they would favor its repeal.

In the consideration of section 5 of the Panama bill we are dealing with a subject of as great importance to the shipping interests of the country as Congress did in the consideration of the interstate-commerce law and in the amendments thereto. In the effort to encourage traffic through the canal we are establishing a competitor with the railroads in which every part of the United States is vitally interested. I represent on this floor a district in the city of New York. As a result of the opening of the Panama Canal that city will become within a short period easily the greatest commercial center in the world. The granting of free tolls to the ships in the coastwise trade will unquestionably add some to the commercial importance of that city, but it is of small moment compared to its effect upon the agricultural and manufacturing business of the entire country. It has been well said in the minority report:

> The tolls imposed at the canal will be added to the freight paid by the American people who consume the commodities. We hold this proposition to be fundamental; and viewed in this light, free tolls to our coastwise trade would not be a subsidy to shipowners, but a concession to the American people.

Every ton of merchandise carried through the canal is that much merchandise taken from the transcontinental railroads, thereby compelling the transcontinental roads to compete with the canal. The effect of this, it seems plain to me, would be to compel the transcontinental roads to meet the competition of the canal, thereby lessening freight rates between points within the country. The impression seems to prevail that the only people to be benefited by the free tolls in the coastwise trade are at points on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. Careful consideration of the proposition will convince everybody, I am sure, that any reduction in freight rates forced by sea competition between New York and San Francisco is contemporaneously applied between Chicago and St. Paul, Kansas City and St. Louis, and, in fact, every city of the Middle West on the one hand and the Pacific coast cities and towns on the other. The selfish interests of the railroads serving the Middle West is the strongest possible guaranty of the perpetuity of this already established rate-making system. If, by reason of free tolls to vessels in the coastwise trade, freight rates between New York and Seattle would be less than if tolls were charged, they will by the same measure be less between St. Paul and Chicago, Omaha and St. Louis, and Kansas City on the one hand and Seattle and Portland, San Francisco and Los Angeles on the other. In all of the hearings before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce on the subject of free tolls no one appeared in advocacy of American ships engaged in the coastwise trade paying tolls.

THE RIGHT OF CONGRESS TO GRANT FREE TOLLS TO AMERICAN SHIPS IN THE COASTWISE TRADE.

Coastwise trade is, and was at the time of the negotiations of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, restricted by law to transportation exclusively in American ships, and ships of all other nations were and are prohibited from engaging therein; therefore it appears that coastwise commerce in the very nature of things can not be affected by the terms of the treaty which relates to tolls. That provision reads as follows:

> The canal shall be free and open to vessels of commerce and war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect to the conditions and charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

It seems clear that the general statement in this clause regarding "terms of equality" is defined and limited by what follows, and therefore it becomes the attitude of the United States only to so adjust the question of tolls—> that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect to the conditions and charges of traffic or otherwise.

In this phase the question of the application of tolls relates to four classes of commerce:

First. Commerce between nations other than the United States passing through the Panama Canal.

To this class the full force of the treaty provision applies, and tolls must be so adjusted that vessels of all nations observing the rules of neutrality shall enjoy the free and open use of the canal on terms of equality; that is, with equality of tolls.

Second. Commerce between the United States and foreign countries passing through the canal in foreign ships.

It seems clear that the United States is under the same treaty obligations as to tolls because the commerce carried is the foreign commerce of the United States, and more particularly because the vessel is owned by a foreign country.

Third. Commerce between the United States and foreign countries passing through the canal in ships of the United States.

There is a difference of opinion concerning the obligations arising from the treaty in reference to this class of commerce, and there is well-grounded opinion among many people that it should also go through the canal without paying tolls, many holding that the clause referred to in the treaty might easily be construed to permit, not to forbid, this. The minority of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce have not discussed this phase of the subject in their report, and I believe it is an open question.

Fourth. Commerce between parts of the United States which under the long-standing law must be confined to transportation in vessels of the United States.

This constitutes a kind of commerce in which no ships of any foreign nation are permitted to engage and, therefore, whatever the Government should do in reference to tolls thereof in the Panama Canal could not in the very nature of the case constitute any "discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect to the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise," as stated in the treaty. Hence, so far as the treaty obligations are concerned, the United States is morally and legally entitled to make such provisions concerning tolls on coastwise commerce passing through the canal as it may desire, including exemptions from all tolls if thought wise. Under these conditions coastwise commerce is strictly a part of our internal domestic commerce, any regulations concerning which can not constitute discrimination against other nations or other subjects.

Many eminent legal authorties agree that the provisions of the treaty do not relate to our coastwise commerce and, therefore, it may be exempted from tolls. I am informed that the Secretary of War, Mr. Stimson, goes further even, stating that as a legal proposition he has no doubt whatever that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty gives full liberty of action to the United States and would permit us to do whatever we pleased in relation to either our ocean or coastwise trade. Having this freedom of action, as I believe, the question passes from one of treaty obligation to one of commercial expediency and propriety.

DOMESTIC COMMERCE SHOULD BE FREE.

The policy of the Federal Government relative to the freedom of commerce, as declared by act of Congress, adopted in 1884, and still in effect, which reads:

> No tolls or operating charges shall be levied upon or collected from any vessel, dredge, or other water craft for passing through any lock, canal, canalized river, or other work for the use of and benefit of navigation now belonging to the United States and that may hereafter be acquired or constructed.

The United States has expended on waterway development of various kinds $693,914,237.08 up to 1911. This enormous expenditure has been made under the policy stated before at the general expense of the whole country, although the direct benefit in most instances has accrued to the particular locality in which each individual project was located. In spite of this fact, however, no section advocates or would permit a change in this general policy.

Commercially the Panama Canal will directly benefit a greater portion of the country than any other waterway improvement ever undertaken. All the coast, all sections tributary thereto of inland waterways which have their ultimate outlet in the ocean or Gulf, together with the vast area served thereby, are directly benefited. If freedom from tolls on commerce is guaranteed in the waterways of lesser general benefit, how much more just it is that the same freedom for commerce passing through this work of greater general benefit should be provided for. Incident to the opening of the canal, in response to the impending economic and military needs of the whole Nation, comes the question of the terms upon which commerce, other than our coastwise commerce, may be accorded the privilege of using that waterway. By all other nations the canal can not be considered simply as an artery of transportation, and to them the peculiar economic and military benefits referred to above can not accrue. Therefore it is but just that those people of other nations who actually use the canal as such an artery of transportation should pay a larger toll for the actual service rendered, levied upon the actual ships passing through.

In cases, however, of our own coastwise commerce, it appears to me on the broad national grounds above mentioned that no tolls whatsoever should be levied upon our ships engaged therein. In my opinion, the fact that this particular improvement, made across the Isthmus of Panama and not in the territorial confines of the original United States, should make no difference. The Canal Zone is part of our territory and subject to our use and jurisdiction. It seems to me that the same policy should apply to that waterway as applied to those constructed or improved in any of the thirteen original States or in the territory subsequently acquired. While freedom from tolls on coastwise commerce is a direct benefit to a very large proportion of the territory of the United States, such freedom is in direct harmony with a general waterway policy as declared by Congress, and should therefore become the fixed policy in the case of the Panama Canal.

THE EFFECT OF FREE TOLLS ON AMERICAN SHIPPING.

The idea that free tolls should be established solely for the benefit of American shipping and the suggestion that if this policy was carried out the only beneficiary would be the shipping interests is, in my judgment, erroneous and entirely misleading. The primary object of free tolls is to cheapen the cost to the people on the Pacific coast of the productions of the people of the Middle West, the East, and Atlantic coast of the United States through the reduction in transportation charges that such exemption from tolls will effect, and vice versa, that it will cheapen the cost to the people in the Middle West, the East, and the Atlantic coast parts of the United States of the products of the Pacific Coast States that the reduction in transportation rates that the exemption of vessels in our coastwise trade would effect. The benefit to such American vessels is merely incidental to the much larger objective—the benefit to the people of the United States as a whole, in giving them a larger market in the one case for their products and in the increase of consumption inevitable in the reduction of the cost of such products. It is true that we give a monopoly of our home trade to American ships, built by American workmen, of material taken from American mines and American workshops, and manned by American seamen, paid American wages, and treated like human beings; and it is also true that the United States Government has given to the railroads of the United States in the way of land grants over 157,000,000 acres of public lands and to the trans-Pacific road companies alone over 58,000,000 acres of land, which is equal in area to all of New England and New York State combined. It is hardly a seemly thing for the railroads, either secretly or openly, to oppose the granting of this benefit to vessels using the canal, considering the vast contributions to them in the way of guaranteeing their bonds and the granting of untold millions in the way of land by the United States to aid in the construction of their roads. It will be quite impossible for the vessels enjoying the use of the Panama Canal free to ever be relieved from a sum the total of which would approximate the interest upon the amount of these donations to the transcontinental railroads.

The trifling proportion of continental traffic that would be transferred from the railroads to ships passing through the canal would be much more than offset—very much more than offset—by the increased business that the railroads would enjoy in moving the products of the country to the seaboard, in shipment from one coast to the other, and in moving the products so carried by ships from the seaboard to the interior of the country. The great point is that reduced transportation charges not only attract commerce but they create commerce. As to the incidental benefit to American vessels that would follow their exemption from tolls, this would consist entirely in the increased traffic that would use the canal in the coast trade; that is to say, if tolls are imposed upon vessels in the coast-to-coast trade, there will doubtless be a substantial tonnage carried by such vessels. Then the increase due to exemption from tolls would measure the benefits that American vessels could enjoy therefrom, and it would not by any means measure the amount of the exemption in the matter of rates that vessels would enjoy. The statement that if the vessels were exempted from tolls the total benefits would go into the pockets of the vessel owners and not the producers or the consumers of the merchandise thus carried is entirely erroneous. Of course, if freight rates were pooled or their amount fixed by agreement between the carriers—a thing not to be thought of in view of the safeguards with which Congress seemed determined to surround the merchandise thus carried—then such a condition might follow. If the railroads are to be permitted to freely use the canal in the coast trade with their own vessels, and pursue the tactics for which they have been notorious in effacing competition, such a condition might obtain. But there seems to be small chance of the railroads being permitted to exert any such baneful influence upon traffic. The ships that use the canal will be in active competition with each other, and the rates they will charge will be based upon any sum of reasonable profit to them; the competition between them will render any excessive charges quite impracticable. Considering that we have ceased to build ships for foreign trade because our Government has been unwilling to extend the protective system to vessels in foreign trade, thus denying them the right they should enjoy in common with all producers of goods in the United States that are subject to foreign competition, our domestic trade alone now affords opportunity for the retention and preservation of our maritime rank.

The opening up of the Panama Canal affords a signal opportunity for a substantial increase in American shipping, for increase in the type of seagoing ships that would be most useful to the Nation in time of need. In contemplation of the increased trade in the canal, a number of new vessels have been ordered constructed. The American-Hawaiian Steamship Co. are having constructed three great vessels, the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. are contemplating the building of three more; in fact, only yesterday I was informed that all the shipyards of the east coast are fast filling up with orders for new vessels in expectation of a largely increased trade immediately on the opening of the canal. To the extent, therefore, that the United States facilitates freedom of trade and the increase of trade through cheap rates of transportation between the coasts, to that extent it increases the demand for seagoing vessels of the United States and brings to its support a reserve marine that may yet prove invaluable to the Nation. This I regard as a consideration of the greatest importance, and I venture to hope that in the consideration of this legislation the House will appreciate the importance of this phase of the question.

THE ATTITUDE OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK ON THE MATTER OF FREE TOLLS.

The advanced and enlightened position that the State of New York has taken in the matter of water transportation facilities and the generation that has passed since our canals were free from tolls—by a majority of 322,000 in 1882—through an amendment to the State's constitution, should receive the most careful consideration of Congress, and especially from every Member from the State of New York and the Middle and Northwestern States. Since we freed our canals from tolls their ordinary repair and maintenance has averaged a cost of over a million dollars a year. In addition to small sums for lock enlargement and duplication, there have been appropriated the following sums for the enlargement of our canals since they were freed from tolls: In 1895, $9,000,000; in 1903, $101,000,000; and in 1909, $7,000,000, making a total of $117,000,000 for enlargement, plus $30,000,000 for ordinary repair and maintenance, a grand total of $147,000,000 the State of New York has expended and is expending upon the canals that the people 30 years ago, by a majority of 322,000, declared to be free of tolls.

If the single State of New York can afford to expend $147,000,000 in the enlargement and maintenance of its canals in 30 years, free of all tolls or charges to vessels or freight carried over it, can not the United States afford to exempt vessels in at least the coast-to-coast trade from tolls in using the Panama Canal? The population and wealth of the State of New York form not over one-twelfth of the entire United States—population, one-tenth, and wealth about one-twelfth—so that if the United States should free the Panama Canal from any tolls on any vessels using it, the total cost of the canal's construction, together with all the money the United States has expended upon river and harbor improvements, would not approximate a sum proportionately as large as the State of New York has expended. Is the position of the State of New York as a result of this enlightened policy suggestive that these vast expenditures for its toll-free canals has been to the injury of the State or any of its inhabitants? On the contrary, the State of New York has achieved the position it now occupies as the Empire State of the Union chiefly as a result of its advanced and enlightened policy of improving and enlarging the canals and freeing them from all tolls. The people of the entire State gladly bear the entire burden of these charges, as likewise they will willingly bear their full share of the cost of maintaining the Panama Canal for the benefits that accrue to the people as a whole. This is a wise policy. It is the policy of the State of New York as adhered to for nearly a century in building and maintaining its canals, and for 30 years of improving and maintaining them free of all tolls. Bear in mind that the improved canals of that State will accommodate boats of 1,000 tons and over, an accomplishment that is expected by a great majority of the people of the State of New York will greatly redound to the benefit of all its people and clearly to those of the Middle and Northwestern States.

The reduction in transportation charges that it is expected will be effected through our improved canals will far more than repay the people of the State for the sums they expend upon their enlargement and maintenance free of all tolls. In the election of 1911 the people of my State agreed to bond themselves in the sum of $19,800,000 for the construction of canal terminals—depots for the handling and temporary care of freight carried on its canals. New York is the first State in the Union to take so advanced a position as to construct freight terminals for water-borne traffic, and this is all a part with the enlightenment of its people and their appreciation of the estimable advantages of cheap transportation. In all of the discussion of free canals and enlarging canals the benefit to canal boats and barges have kept their relative secondary or incidental position; the direct benefit to the vessels has never been a claim advanced for any of the work undertaken. Why, then, should benefit to vessels using the canal be given such prominence and the benefits to the people through reduced freight charges and greater consuming ability as a consequence almost be lost sight of?

Mr. Chairman, I will submit as an appendix to my remarks the following resolutions adopted by the great commercial bodies of the State of New York favorable to the views of the minority on the question of free tolls through the Panama Canal for American vessels engaged in the coastwise trade:

Resolutions adopted by the Merchants' Association of New York, March 5, 1912:

"Whereas the United States, by act of Congress passed in 1884, made the following declaration of policy regarding tolls or charges relative to waterways acquired or constructed by the Federal Government: 'No tolls or operating charges shall be levied upon or collected from any vessel, dredge, or other water craft for passing through any lock, canal, canalized river, or other work for the use of and benefit of navigation now belonging to the United States, or that may be hereafter acquired or constructed'; and

"Whereas, under that policy, which is still in operation, the United States has expended on local waterway developments nearly $700,000,000 at the general expense of the whole country; and

"Whereas the Federal Government, in addition to its vast expenditures of public funds upon internal and seacoast waterways, for the use and benefit of all sections and of all the people, free from imposition of tolls or charges for the use thereof, has also made vast grants of public lands of incalculable present value to the transcontinental railways to promote their construction and the interests of the whole country, especially of the sections which they directly serve; and

"Whereas the Panama Canal is constructed primarily because of the military and economic necessities of the entire United States, and when completed will be of direct commercial benefit to a larger area of the country than any other waterway ever constructed or improved by the Federal Government; and

"Whereas the extension of the general policy of freedom from tolls to the domestic coastwise commerce of the United States passing through the Panama Canal can not create a discrimination against any other nation or its citizens or subjects in respect to the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise because of the fact that no such nation has been or now is permitted by law to engage in such coastwise commerce, which law was in operation and contemplation at the time of the negotiation and ratification of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty; and

"Whereas the provision of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty appears to relate to the avoidance of discriminations between the nations and therefore does not pertain to our domestic coastwise trade, in the treatment of which there can be no such discrimination as prohibited in said treaty: Now therefore be it

"Resolved, That the report of the special committee on tolls on coastwise commerce passing through the Panama Canal, dated February 26, 1912, be, and hereby is, approved; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Merchants' Association of New York opposes the proposition of imposing any tolls whatsoever upon the domestic coastwise commerce of the United States passing through the Panama Canal, unless it be determined, by competent authority, that the imposing of such tolls is required in fulfillment of our treaty obligations."

Resolutions adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, March 7, 1912:

"Resolved, That the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York earnestly urges the President of the United States and the Congress, while honorably carrying out all existing treaties or obligations entered into with foreign countries, to arrange the tolls on the Panama Canal so as to carefully protect American interests, and bring about the upbuilding of our merchant marine; and that we advocate, as a measure to this end, that the rates of toll on vessels engaged in the coastal trade shall be not over one-third the rates charged on vessels engaged in deep-sea business, or free if necessary to accomplish purposes desired.

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the President, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and to all Members of the United States Senate and the House of Representatives."

Resolutions adopted by the Maritime Association of the Port of New York, July 12, 1911:

"Whereas, from present indications, the Panama Canal will be ready for use by merchant shipping in about two years' time; and

"Whereas it is necessary that those contemplating the operation of vessels through the canal should be informed at the earliest possible moment regarding the regulations that will govern said operation, so that sufficient time will be given to conform with every requirement: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That Congress be strongly urged to enact at this session such legislation as will enable the President to fix the tolls to be charged for the use of the canal, it being the consensus of opinion of this committee that in the fixing of said tolls American vessels should be exempted from all charges."

Resolutions adopted by the New York Board of Trade and Transportation, December 13, 1911:

"Whereas the Panama Canal is being constructed by the United States Government, and the people of the United States are paying the whole cost thereof, and will be obliged to pay the cost of maintenance and repairs, whether the revenues are adequate or not; and

"Whereas the people of the United States have entered upon this great work chiefly for the benefit that it will be to our own commerce; and

"Whereas the construction of the Panama Canal by the United States will not give to the American people the full measure of benefits they are entitled to if our commerce is compelled to pay the same tolls that other peoples are required to pay: Therefore

"Resolved, That, having expended so large a sum in constructing the Panama Canal, the people of the United States are entitled to receive the fullest possible advantages therefrom; that other nations should be permitted to use the canal upon reasonable terms alike to all; that American vessels in the foreign trade should pay the same tolls as vessels of other nations, unless existing treaties would permit such American vessels to pass free; that the commerce of the United States passing between United States ports should be allowed free passage through the Panama Canal in all ships of American registry and should be regarded and regulated as coastwise commerce of the United States.

"Resolved, That we petition the Government and Congress of the United States to give the most serious consideration to the enactment of laws declaring commerce between American ports, passing through the Panama Canal, as coastwise commerce of the United States and free of tolls, and, if treaty provisions or commercial conventions which have provisions for termination by notice from either party, will permit to also consider the making of the Panama Canal free to all vessels of American registry."

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

FREE TOLLS IN COASTWISE TRADE ARE IMPOSSIBLE. SUCH A POLICY WOULD VIOLATE OUR SOLEMN TREATY OBLIGATIONS AND PLEDGES, IMPERIL OUR VAST INTERNATIONAL INTERESTS, INTRODUCE COMPLICATIONS IN FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC AFFAIRS LIKELY TO BE SERIOUS, EVADE JUST PROPORTION OF HEAVY PUBLIC BURDENS BY THOSE RECEIVING THE GREATEST BENEFITS AND BEST ABLE TO BEAR THEM, AND UNFAIRLY FAVOR PRIVATE AND SECTIONAL DEMANDS AS AGAINST THE BROAD NATIONAL INTERESTS AND WELFARE.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, my discussion will be confined to section 5 of the bill, which relates to the tolls and charges for vessels in their passage through the canal.

It was the judgment of the majority of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce that the section as reported, providing that all vessels should be treated alike and on the same basis, was necessary and for the best advantage of the people and the Government of the United States and for the welfare of the canal itself.

REASONS AGAINST FREE TOLLS.

Substantially, the reasons for this action are as follows:

First. Because the treaty obligations of the United States require "treatment on terms of entire equality, without discrimination, of all nations," including our own in the use of the canal; and any violation of these obligations would be a betrayal of the faith and honor of our Government and a reversal of the traditional policy of our Nation toward the canal since the inception of the enterprise.

Second. Unfair discrimination in favor of our own ships, which would violate international pledges, would seriously injure our foreign trade, not only with the nations on the Pacific, which would be most affected, but also with other nations which would resent our violations of pledges and discrimination, and in turn would retaliate against our commerce and people.

Third. Discrimination or free tolls for American ships in coastwise trade would not build up the American merchant marine because the rate of toll, $1 per net registered ton, would amount to between 40 and 60 cents per cargo ton, which would not be sufficient to encourage or warrant the construction of new vessels, and would not reduce prices to consumers, being only 2 or 3 cents per hundred pounds. Again, under existing laws, American vessels have a monopoly of the coastwise trade. This monopoly is further restricted by section 11 of this bill, prohibiting ships owned or controlled by competing railroads engaging in coastwise traffic through the Panama Canal. In addition, the enforcement of section 4 of the interstate-commerce act, known as the "long and short haul" clause, will gradually tend toward distance tariffs, which will diminish railroad competition in the coast-to-coast traffic, and so help the canal traffic. These reasons render coastwise subsidies unnecessary to develop the coastwise business.

Fourth. The annual expense in caring for the canal will be an enormous burden upon the American people for all future time. Testimony shows that this expense for operation, maintenance, protection, and interest charged on the investment for the canal will be between $25,000,000 and $30,000,000 per annum. If the additional cost for naval protection, replacement, and retirement of the particular forces be added, such amount will be increased to between $40,000,000 and $50,000,000 per annum. Thus the annual expenditure for the construction of the canal can never be reduced and may be much increased. The canal will reduce freight rates from coast to coast from 25 to 50 per cent, and it is only fair that this vast commerce, so greatly benefited by the construction of the canal, should bear its fair share of the enormous burden of caring for it.

Fifth. The main effect of discrimination, or free tolls for American ships in the coastwise trade, would be to help the great mercantile interests of the coasts in competing with their trade rivals of the interior. The reduction of freight rates by the opening of the canal, will greatly help the business interests of the coasts in extending their trade territory and proportionally diminish that of the interior competing with them. Blanket rates to the coast will be in large part discontinued, and the railroads can not be allowed to reduce to the low rates provided by water competition, because of the injurious effects to the intermediate territory. Under these circumstances, it would not seem to be fair or just, to levy an additional burden on the country in order to have free tolls for the purpose of still further diminishing the trade of the interior, and proportionally increasing the competitive capacity of the coasts. It would not seem fair, to levy taxes upon a section of the country to use in strangling and reducing its own natural business. That would be the necessary and almost only effect of free tolls in coastwise trade.

Sixth. Free tolls and discrimination against other nations in violation of treaty obligations would incite resentment and reprisals against our commerce and interests in the use of other international waters under the control of some one nation suffering from our discrimination. It would revive the old contention of Canada discriminating against American interests in the use of its canals in the region of the Great Lakes, and might cause a loss of many millions annually and injuriously affect the Central West, already discriminated against by the operation of the canal.

II.

CONSTRUCTION OF TREATIES.

It necessarily is of prime importance, to examine the exact text of the treaty obligations of this country with others concerning the canal, to ascertain precisely what may or may not be done under such agreements.

No fair or sensible man desires to have his Government deliberately violate its solemn obligations and pledges to the other nations, concerning the use of the Panama Canal. But honest and intelligent men may fairly and justly differ as to what such agreements and pledges actually are. This shall be my endeavor to ascertain and place of record as concisely and clearly as possible.

In this investigation, and in the interpretation and construction of these treaties, there must be adopted the ordinary fair and just rules which have for many years, and among all civilized nations, been used for such purposes; and which would be applied to all other treaties as well as to these, to all other nations as well as to our own, and to all occasions when the interest of our Nation and people would be best served by the rule adopted, as well as when they would seem to be injured by such rules. These rules should bear impartially upon all, and at all times, and be so fair and reasonable and just as to receive the common acceptation of civilized mankind. We can not afford to follow any other course, at the inception of this great enterprise. But we should endeavor to find out exactly what the situation is, and construe in our own favor whatever we fairly and justly can, with the object always to advance all the interests of our own people and seek the just advantage of our own Nation as much as we possibly can do, and as much as should be decently done.

We must realize always, that the rule which we insist upon in any situation will most certainly be invoked hereafter in other situations and controversies; and we must be willing to do in these cases as we might be willing to have done hereafter in any other cases, in which we might be involved.

TREATIES.

The United States has entered into two treaties concerning the use and control of the Panama Canal which are now in force. The first, with Great Britain, known as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty initiated by Secretary of State Hay in 1898, was signed in Washington November 18, 1901, ratified by the Senate December 16, 1901, and proclaimed by the President February 22, 1902.

The second treaty was with Panama, signed at Washington November 18, 1903, ratified by the Senate February 23, 1904, and proclaimed by the President February 26, 1904. This treaty by article 18 provides for the operation of the canal on the terms provided by the treaty with Great Britain, so there is no need to separately discuss its provisions. The text of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and of the Panama Canal treaty and all its sections and provisions, as promulgated and now in force, are annexed to and made a part of these remarks.

The section in the treaty with Great Britain which is the center of this controversy is section 1, article 3, as follows:

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations, observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

This language is plain on its face; and from its terms there can be no inequality or discrimination in favor of or against any vessels, citizens, traffic, or country, but all must be treated exactly alike, subjected to the same tolls, charges, and conditions, without any distinction.

SOME CONSTRUE DIFFERENTLY.

Apparently clear and plain as is this provision, yet some public officials, many patriotic and intelligent citizens, commercial and public organizations, and an influential portion of our press strongly and sincerely contend that an exception must be implied from this plain and clear language, by which vessels of the United States engaged in coastwise trade can be authorized to have free or discriminating tolls in their use of this canal.

The reasons claimed for this exception are in substance two: First, because the laws of the United States give a monopoly in our coastwise trade to vessels constructed, owned, and operated by American citizens, and other vessels are prohibited from engaging in such coastwise trade or in any part of it; consequently the coastwise vessels constitute a peculiar class under our laws, so that no foreigner can complain as to any preference or discrimination granted to our own ships in such trade, in which they can not compete. Secondly, it is urged that under the provisions of article 2 of the treaty, the United States may have all the rights incident to the construction of the canal and the exclusive right of regulation and management of it. And in the making of such rules and regulations that discrimination can be shown to domestic vessels and trade.

RULES AND REGULATIONS NOT ADEQUATE.

This last reason and argument is not seriously considered by intelligent students, because such regulations and management must be by the very terms of the same article, "subject to the provisions of the present treaty," which includes the section above cited. If this section allows such discriminating rules, they can be made to favor our own domestic commerce. If that section does not allow any such preference, then they can not be fairly adopted. So the question finally and decisively must be determined upon the fair, just, and reasonable interpretation of section 1, article 3, as to whether the coastwise trade of the United States can be fairly excepted from its plain terms declaring equality and forbidding discrimination.

SOME EXCLUDE ALL AMERICAN SHIPS FROM TREATY.

Some public-spirited citizens would go so far as to demand that foreign as well as coastwise shipping should be excepted from this section, and that there should be implied the word "other" between the words "all" and "nations" in the second line of the section. This would make the section refer only to the vessels of all other nations except the United States, and so exclude our foreign commerce from the terms of this section.

But this contention is not seriously urged, and has no reason or precedent for such a violent wrenching of all language, precedent, rules of interpretation, and policy; and so has not been seriously considered. The main controversy must be as to whether the section as it stands, fairly and justly excepts coastwise commerce from its provisions. And to that I shall confine myself, in discussing the treaty obligations of the United States with reference to the Panama Canal; and it is certain that if no exception as to coastwise trade can be fairly made from the terms of the treaty, then the same situation must exist as to foreign commerce.

ALL SECTIONS CONSIDERED TOGETHER.

At the outset, a fair and clear interpretation of the language of the treaty itself should be ascertained to find what basis exists within its terms, for an important exception from its plain provisions. Section 1, article 3, should be considered together with article 2, which provides three methods for constructing the canal. First, by the United States itself at its own cost; second, by individuals or corporations whom the United States might assist by loan or gift of money; third, by individuals or corporations with whom the United States may cooperate through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares. Article 2 is as follows:

> ART. 2. It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost, or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

Necessarily the rules as to the use of the canal prescribed in section 1, article 3, must apply in the same way to all of these methods of construction and to whichever one of them may be adopted. There is nothing in the treaty indicating any different treatment of American coastwise vessels, whether the canal be constructed by private corporations or by the Government itself. This being true, with no provision in the treaty granting any preferential right or privilege, but, on the contrary, the strongest kind of language forbidding it; it must be difficult for any impartial person to fairly contend, that a corporation constructing the canal at its own expense and operating it for a profit, as the Suez Canal was constructed and is operated, can, under these circumstances and conditions, be compelled to give free passage to a large class of vessels possibly yielding a larger profit to their owners, owned by other corporations or interests not named, described, or excepted anywhere in the treaty.

SUEZ PROVISIONS.

It should be noted here, that article 12 of the convention, described in this treaty, governing the use of the Suez Canal, provides for "equal use" by all nations without advantage or discrimination in favor of any; expressly "reserving the rights of Turkey as the territorial sovereign." In the Panama treaty there is no reservation, but, on the contrary, the strongest prohibition against such discrimination. While the Suez treaty was careful to provide for such discrimination, expressly as was desired for the territorial sovereign. Under the ordinary rules of construction, where the Suez Convention is used as a basis for the Panama treaty, there would also be no exception unless expressly provided for. Such exception has not been made, but just the contrary language is used in the Panama treaty requiring treatment of entire equality without any discrimination, with very good reason and consideration for its deliberate use.

NO REASON FOR EXCEPTION.

It is submitted, that under this treaty any corporation constructing and operating the canal under this provision, could and would not be compelled to relinquish without consideration, any of its legitimate revenues to another corporation owning and operating American ships in the coastwise trade.

Exactly the same rule must apply to the construction and operation by the United States as by a private corporation doing the same thing, because the same language and the same authority and rules apply to both. There can be no exception in one case, unless it can also be an exception in the other.

It can hardly be argued that the United States might exact as a condition of any grant, aid, or subscription that there should be a preference or discrimination to its coastwise trade; because that very thing is expressly forbidden by the broad terms of section 1, article 3, prohibiting any such exception or condition.

STOCKHOLDER WOULD HAVE SAME RIGHT.

Any other stockholder or guarantor could have as much right to exact his own private conditions for his own private advantage, with the result that the enterprise would face ruin from the start. The treaty gives the United States, as a stockholder or guarantor, no other rights than any other interest also assisting in the enterprise. A British, German, French, or Japanese steamship company might subscribe, own, and hold large blocks of stock or bonds in a corporation provided in section 2, and with equal right under the treaty might demand a preference for its vessels as an exception on account of such ownership. Of course, such a demand would be absurd and unjust, and yet equally valid and equitable as a similar demand and exception for the United States. The terms of the treaty and the existing situation would seem to practically and legally make the United States a corporation sole, for the purpose of constructing, operating, and managing the canal with exactly the same rights, obligations, and responsibilities which would pertain to any other corporation provided for by the treaty, doing exactly the same thing under the treaty.

This discussion is academic, because no such condition for a preference here exists; but it illustrates the fallacy of seeking to imply an exception in favor of our coastwise trade, when the plain provisions of the treaty so clearly exclude any such unfair discrimination.

III.

TREATIES—NEUTRALIZATION.

It has been agreed expressly in the treaties, and always understood among the nations, that the basis for the beneficial use of the canal must be its neutralization in time of war and peace, so that there shall be a certainty that peaceful commerce at all times can enjoy its privileges. This policy signifies impartiality so far as conduct and operation are concerned, and carefully abstaining from acts to aid either belligerent in time of war. With special reference to the canal, it signifies that it is not to be made the object of attack by any power, nor distinctively employed by any nation as a means of or base for hostilities.

RULES FOR NEUTRALIZATION.

Article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty sets forth the rules for such neutralization, first and as the foundation, "entire equality of treatment between all vessels of all nations without any discrimination;" next, "that the canal shall not be blockaded or used for war or any acts of belligerents; third, that the waters and plant of the canal be included within the neutralization." These provisions are the substance of the rules laid down by the Suez convention concerning that canal; and the essence and practice as to that and all other neutralized waters has been the perfect equality of treatment of all vessels, traffic, and persons as an integral part of their neutrality and operation.

NO EXCEPTION IMPLIED.

If by implication an exception must be made as to coastwise vessels, so far as equality is concerned, and they in that way can be treated differently from all other vessels, the same rule as to exception by implication must also obtain as to neutralization of them. The two attributes can not and should not be separated. In fairness and justice and from the reason of things, they belong together, because no nation is under any moral obligation to observe the rules of neutrality as to commerce receiving discriminating terms as against its own, when the plain language of the treaty provides for equal treatment without discrimination. This being true, our coastwise commerce in and about the canal, if not on an equality with other commerce, would not be neutralized and would be subjected to different rules from all other commerce, as to the acts of belligerency set forth in article 3.

EQUALITY AND NEUTRALIZATION.

Prof. John Bassett Moore, perhaps the highest authority on this subject, has said that—equality of tolls has also been treated as a feature or perhaps rather as a condition of neutralization. Little need to be said on the subject since a discriminating policy, even if it did not lead to the building of another canal, would merely provoke retaliation in some form and prove in the end to be impracticable.

The opinions of other notable authorities are invariably to the same effect.

[Extract from the report of Senator Davis of Minnesota, from the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, recommending the ratification of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.]

That the United States sought no exclusive privilege or preferential right of any kind in regard to the proposed communication, and their sincere wish, if it should be found practical, was to see it dedicated to the common use of all nations on the most liberal terms and a footing of perfect equality for all.

That the United States would not if they could obtain any exclusive right or privilege in a great highway which naturally belongs to all mankind.

That while they aim at no exclusive privilege for themselves, they could never consent to see so important a communication fall under the exclusive control of any other great commercial power.

If, however, the British Government shall reject these overtures on our part, and shall refuse to cooperate with us in the generous and philanthropic scheme of rendering the interoceanic communication by the way of the port and river San Juan free to all nations upon the same terms, we shall deem ourselves justified in protecting our interest independently of aid and despite of her opposition or hostility.

It was an explicit and peremptory demand for an agreement that would give to Nicaragua the freedom of exit to the sea through the San Juan River for a ship canal that should be open to all nations on equal terms and protected by an agreement of perfect neutrality.

In the origin of our claim to the right of way for our people and our produce, armies, mails, and other property through the canal, we offer to dedicate the canal to the equal use of mankind.

As to neutrality and the exclusive control of the canal and its dedication to universal use, the suggestions that were incorporated in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty came from the United States and were concurred in by Great Britain. In no instance has the Government of the United States intimated an objection to this treaty on account of the features of neutrality, its equal and impartial use by all other nations.

No American statesman, speaking with official authority or responsibility, has ever intimated that the United States would attempt to control this canal for the exclusive benefit of our Government or people. They have all, with one accord, declared that the canal was to be neutral ground in time of war and always open on terms of impartial equity to the ships and commerce of the world.

Special treaties for the neutrality, impartiality, freedom, and innocent use of the two canals that are to be the eastern and western gateways of commerce between the two great oceans are not in keeping with the magnitude and universality of the blessings they must confer upon mankind. The subject rather belongs to the domain of international law.

The leading powers of Europe recognized the importance of this subject in respect of the Suez Canal, and ordained a public international act for its neutralization that is an honor to the civilization of the age. It is the beneficent work of all Europe and not of Great Britain alone. Whenever a canal is built in the Isthmus of Darien, it will be ultimately made subject to the same law of freedom and neutrality as governs the Suez Canal, as a part of the laws of nations, and no single power will be able to resist its control.

The European powers gave to this subject the greatest consideration, and reached conclusions that are not open to criticism as being unjust to any nation in the world. Turkey and Egypt, the imperial and the local sovereigns of the canal, and Great Britain, a controlling stockholder in the Maritime Canal Co., had special interests in the rules for regulating the use of the canal, and they united in the convention which deprived them of exceptional privileges in its navigation, in peace and in war, for the sake of justice to all maritime nations and the peace and prosperity of the world.

No nation disapproves of this great act, or has had grounds of complaint against it. No American will ever be found to complain of it. It is right in its moral features, in its impartiality, and, above all, in its tendency to decrease the resort to war for the settlement of international quarrels, and will have the cordial approval of the American people.

The United States can not take an attitude of opposition to the principles of the great act of October 22, 1888, without discrediting the official declarations of our Government for 50 years on the neutrality of an isthmian canal and its equal use by all nations, without discrimination.

To set up the selfish motive of gain by establishing a monopoly of a highway that must derive its income from the patronage of all maritime countries, would be unworthy of the United States if we owned the country through which the canal is to be built.

But the location of the canal belongs to other governments, from whom we must obtain any right to construct a canal on their territory, and it is not unreasonable, if the question was new and was not involved in a subsisting treaty with Great Britain, that she should question the right of even Nicaragua and Costa Rica to grant to our ships of commerce and of war extraordinary privileges of transit through the canal.

It is not reasonable to suppose that Nicaragua and Costa Rica would grant to the United States the exclusive control of a canal through those States on terms less generous to the other maritime nations than those prescribed in the great act of October 22, 1888; or if we could compel them to give us such advantages over other nations it would not be creditable to our country to accept them.

That our Government or our people will furnish the money to build the canal presents the single question whether it is profitable to do so. If the canal, as property, is worth more than its cost we are not called on to divide the profits with other nations. If it is worth less, and we are compelled by national necessities to build the canal, we have no right to call on other nations to make up the loss to us. In any view, it is a venture that we will enter upon if it is to our interest, and if it is otherwise we will withdraw from its further consideration.

In this convention we stipulate against the blockade of the canal by any nation.

In conditions that may not be entirely remote we would find this provision, in letting our ships through the canal free from capture by our enemy, of great security to our coastwise trade.

IV.

PREAMBLE AND "GENERAL PRINCIPLES."

One of the most important considerations in the construction of this section 1, article 3, as to "equality of treatment without discrimination," and as to whether an exception concerning our coastwise vessels can be implied from it, must be from the language of the preamble of the treaty. This preamble is in terms:

"The United States of America and His Majesty Edward the Seventh, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, etc., being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th of April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention, have for that purpose appointed, etc."

CONSTRUCTION OF PREAMBLE.

It is a fundamental principle of construction of all documents that such a preamble shows first of all the reason for the making and existence of the agreement, document, or act; and secondly, that the language of the document, treaty, etc., should be so construed, if reasonably possible, to give effect to such purpose. (Moore, 5 Dig. Int. Law, p. 249.)

It is a general principle of construction with respect to treaties that they shall be liberally construed, so as to carry out the apparent intentions of the parties to secure equality and reciprocity between them. As they are contracts between independent nations, in their construction words are to be taken in their ordinary meaning as understood in the public law of nations, and not in any artificial or special sense impressed upon them by local law, unless such restricted sense is clearly intended. And it has been held by this court that where a treaty admits of two constructions, one restrictive of rights that may be claimed under it and the other favorable to them, the latter is to be preferred.

Hauenstein v. Lynham (100 U. S., 483–487); Goefy v. Riggs (1890, 133 U. S., 258–271). See to the same effect, United States v. Auguisola (1 Wall., 352).

That a construction of a treaty most favorable to its execution, as designed by the parties, will be preferred.

United States v. Payne (2 McCrary, 289; 8 Fed. Rep., 883).

A treaty is not only a law, but also a contract between two nations, and, under familiar rules, it must, if possible, be so construed as to give full force and effect to all its parts.

Goetze v. United States (1900, 103 Fed. Rep., 72).

The reason of the law or of the treaty—that is to say, the motive which leads to the making of it and the object in contemplation at the time—is the most certain clue to lead us to the discovery of its true meaning; and great attention should be paid to this circumstance whenever there is question either of explaining an obscure, ambiguous, indeterminate passage in a law or treaty, or of applying it to a particular case. When once we certainly know the reason which alone has determined the will of the person speaking, we ought to interpret and apply his words in a manner suitable to that reason alone; otherwise he will be made to speak and act contrary to his intention and in opposition to his own views. (Vattel, book 2, chap. 17, sec. 287.)

It is important to ascertain what is the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which must not be impaired by this treaty. This article 8 speaks for itself, substantially as follows:

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain having not only desired in entering into this convention to accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a "general principle," they hereby agree to extend their protection by treaty stipulations to any other practical communications, whether by canal or railway, across the isthmus which connects North and South America, and especially to the interoceanic communications—should the same prove to be practical, whether by canal or railway—which are now proposed to be established by the way of Tehuantepec or Panama. In granting, however, their joint protection to any such canals or railways as are by this article specified, it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charge or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford.

It will be noted that the "general principle" is established and embraces, first, protection to the canal; second, that the charges therein shall be just and equitable; and third, that it shall be open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on "equal terms" and also shall be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of other nations willing to grant the same protection to the canal as do Great Britain and the United States.

SAME AS IN PANAMA TREATY.

These are the same provisions as article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and on their face there can be no possible exception of our coastwise commerce. Not only the language of the section but the very reason for the existence of the language forbids such exception, because Great Britain and some other nations had commerce competing with that of the United States, both foreign and coastwise. It was the evident and proper design of this treaty to place all such competing commerce on exactly the same basis, so that there should be no disadvantage or particular advantage on account of this canal to the commerce, coastwise or foreign, of any one nation. This was the object of the whole treaty, and especially of this particular section.

Great Britain and Canada have a large commerce directly competing with some of our coastwise commerce through the Panama Canal, and undoubtedly they undertook to protect such commerce and its interests by insisting upon its equal treatment with all competing commerce in the use of all interoceanic waterways.

The report of the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs submitting the Hay-Pauncefote treaty clearly shows the true policy and intent of this section in both treaties and has been set forth at some length.

SECRETARY OLNEY CONSTRUES.

Secretary of State Olney in 1896, in a memorandum on the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, said (Moore, 3 Dig. Int. Law, p. 207):

As article 8 expressly declares, the contracting parties by the convention desired not only to accomplish a particular object, but to establish a general principle. This general principle is manifested by the provisions of the first seven articles, and is that the interoceanic routes there specified should, under the sovereignty of the States traversed by them, be neutral and free to all nations alike.

CLAYTON-BULWER TREATY PROVISIONS.

The preceding articles of the treaty, which show the intent and purpose of the general principle, are as follows:

Article 1, in part:

Nor will the United States or Great Britain take advantage of any intimacy or use any influence, etc., for the purpose of acquiring or holding, directly or indirectly, for the citizens or subjects of the one, any rights or advantages in regard to commerce and navigation through the said canal which shall not be offered on the same terms to the other.

Article 5, in substance:

The contracting parties further engage that they will guarantee the neutrality thereof, which protection may be withdrawn if unfair discriminations are made in favor of the commerce of the one over the commerce of the other.

Article 6, in part:

The contracting parties engage to invite every State, etc., to enter into stipulations concerning the constructing and maintaining the said canal—for the benefit of mankind, on equal terms to all—and of protecting the same.

GENERAL PRINCIPLES CONSTRUED.

These all show exactly how the term "general principles" must be construed with reference to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, that "equality of treatment of all vessels, foreign and domestic, coastwise and all," must be an integral condition for neutral treatment and a guaranty of protection for the canal.

CONTINUOUS POLICY GOVERNMENT.

This has been the invariable construction of these treaties and of the policy of the United States from the beginning down to the present. It should further be noted as to the action of our Government in carrying out the "general principle," thus construed and defined in these treaties. President Roosevelt in his message of December 4, 1901, transmitting to the Senate the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which was ratified and is now in effect, described it as "A convention without impairing the general principle of neutralization established, etc., in article 8 of that convention." Further, on the 22d day of February, 1902, in the proclamation making such treaty effective, President Roosevelt, in the preamble to it, again sets forth the existence of the "general principle" of neutralization, which was to be maintained by such treaty, and in the final statement of the proclamation is found this clause, "to the end that the same and every article and clause thereof may be observed and fulfilled with good faith by the United States and the citizens thereof."

NOTIFIED WORLD TREATY OBEYED.

Thus the United States Government at once in the proper way notified the world in the exact language of the treaty itself of its intention to observe and fulfill every article and clause thereof.

To show clearly the policy of our Government, it is well to place here the exact terms of article 3, section 1: "The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, etc."

The United States by its President and Secretary of State at once notified the world that it would be the first nation to observe these rules. And it is hardly becoming now for our good citizens to violate such pledge, reverse such policy, abandon the traditional and honored principles, so solemnly agreed to and announced, merely for the sake of granting a bonus or subsidy to some business interests, which for nearly a hundred years under our laws, have enjoyed a monopoly, free from foreign competition, and by this very measure are still further protected by the exclusion of strong domestic competition.

V.

NEGOTIATIONS FOR HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY.

In the construction of the controverted clauses of any document, it is always of prime importance to know exactly what the persons themselves who framed it, intended by the language which is subject to dispute; and when they have set forth their own ideas as to its intention and meaning, and have given good reasons for it, usually such facts have been conclusive as to the construction, whenever the language has fairly allowed.

The negotiations for the modification of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and which resulted in the framing of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty were commenced by Secretary of State John Hay by a letter, December 7, 1898, to Hon. Henry White, chargé at London, and the reply of Mr. White, of date December 22, 1898. These letters are described in Third Moore, Digest International Law, page 210, note A. Another letter of Mr. White, of January 4, 1899, also refers to the same subject.

CONDITION FOR EQUALITY.

From these letters, it appears in at least three different places, that the first and necessary condition of a treaty must be that all vessels of all nations must receive in the canal, the same terms and treatment as American vessels. This condition was emphasized more than any other one provision, and descriptive references were forwarded to make it clear, that such clause must include all vessels of all classes, foreign and coastwise, so there could be no mistake about the meaning of any language in the treaty.

Secretary Hay and our Government readily agreed to such condition, and nobody objected to it, because it has always been the consistent, continuous, and historic policy of our Government for more than 50 years, to do that identical thing. Practically the only exception is the Nicaraguan treaty. That will be referred to hereinafter in proper order.

TREATY SO PREPARED.

So Secretary Hay, with the approval of President McKinley and the proper officials of the United States, prepared the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and submitted it to Great Britain. In it were placed the clauses, heretofore referred to, maintaining the general principle of "equality and neutralization," and expressly setting forth in as clear and explicit language as possible "that the vessels of commerce and war of all nations should be treated on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise." Not a hint of any exception for our coastwise commerce, or any other exception; but on the contrary, the correspondence showed that all intended clearly and beyond question that all vessels, commerce, and citizens must be treated exactly alike.

Surely this preliminary history, these negotiations, the language itself, the preamble, and then the proclamation, in terms following and adopting the language, and the evident and admitted reasons for all of them, should be sufficient to show that no ambiguity or implication of any other meaning could possibly exist. In ordinary cases it would be sufficient, and no further question could be raised. But one additional fact still further reenforces this history and construction.

PROCEEDINGS IN SENATE.

When the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty was before the Senate for ratification on December 13, 1900, the following proceedings appear on page 15, Senate document 85, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session: "On the question to agree to the amendment proposed by Mr. Bard, to wit: Strike out article 3 and substitute the following: 'Article 3. The United States reserves the right in the regulation and management of the canal to discriminate in respect of the charges of traffic in favor of vessels of its own citizens engaged in the coastwise trade.'" It was determined in the negative: Yeas, 27; nays, 43.

SENATE REFUSED PREFERENCE.

This would also seem to show conclusively that no such a provision was intended to be in the treaty or could in any way be implied or inferred from its terms, or such an amendment would not have been offered. The fact that it was rejected shows that the Senate understood such fact, that it did not want such provision but desired to preserve and maintain the general principle of "equality and neutrality" and preserve the uniform and continuous policy as to the canal for more than 50 years. This action of the Senate was so overwhelming that no attempt was made by anyone to offer such an amendment to the second treaty.

ATTEMPT TO OFFSET.

To explain and offset this conclusive evidence that no discrimination was intended by the Senate or should be had for the coastwise trade, the minority, on page 4 of the minority report, inserted a sentence from a private letter of Senator Bard which states:

> When my amendment was under consideration it was generally conceded [the italics are his] by Senators that even without that specific provision the rules of the treaty would not prevent our Government from treating the canal as part of our coast line and consequently could not be construed as a restriction of our interstate commerce, forbidding the discrimination in charges for tolls in favor of our coastwise trade, and this conviction contributed to the defeat of the amendment.

It is very evident that Senator Bard was the only Senator who had such an understanding. Those who voted with him and desired such a policy certainly did not so believe or they would have so declared and would not have so voted. Those who voted against him evidently did not so understand, from statements which some of them have made personally, and from the official action of the others. Six of the Senators who voted with Senator Bard and seven who voted against him are yet in the Senate, and their views can be expressed on this very measure.

SENATOR BARD DID NOT UNDERSTAND.

The very best illustration that Senator Bard did not understand what actually were the views of those who opposed his amendment is shown by the fact that Senator Frye, of Maine, and Senator LODGE, of Massachusetts, who had charge of the treaty in the Senate, and both of whom were probably consulted in its negotiation and preparation, voted against the amendment of Senator Bard. Both of these Senators were very prominent members of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, which had long discussed this whole policy, and especially this very treaty, and both have been foremost in their efforts to promote the American merchant marine for many years and had long experience and great ability; yet both of them seem to have construed the provision of this treaty entirely different than did Senator Bard, because both of them introduced the following bill with reference to tolls on the Panama Canal:

> A bill (S. 3632) to provide for the payment of tolls and transit charges of public vessels of the United States and merchant vessels of the United States passing through the Panama Canal.
> Be it enacted, etc., That all tolls and transit charges which may hereafter be imposed on public vessels of the United States and on merchant vessels of the United States for passing through the Panama Canal shall be paid from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and there are hereby appropriated annually, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums as may be necessary for the purpose; and such appropriations shall be deemed permanent annual appropriations.

This clearly shows that these eminent and experienced Senators, the recognized champions of the coastwise commerce, and members of the committee which passed upon and reported this treaty, voted and acted upon the belief that all vessels, all commerce of all kinds and of all nations, must in the passage of the canal be treated exactly alike and on the same terms; and that there can be no exception or discrimination possible under the treaty in favor of our coastwise trade; but that any aid for that purpose must be by direct action of Congress by proper appropriations and express legislation therefor such as in form has been proposed by both of them.

UNSOUNDNESS OF VIEWS.

There can be no question as to the soundness of such views or the patriotism or wisdom of the eminent men who held them. Finally, to show how much Senator Bard actually knew about that subject, in comparison with the other Senators who had a great interest and knowledge of it, it is only necessary to examine his legislative proposition as it appears from the records of the Senate. Senate Document No. 85, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session, page 15, shows the following:

On the question to agree to the amendment proposed by Mr. Bard, to wit, strike out article 3 and substitute the following:

"ART. 3. The United States reserves the right in the regulation and management of the canal to discriminate in respect of the charges of traffic in favor of vessels of its own citizens engaged in coastwise trade."

The text of the treaty shows article 3 of the original treaty to read as follows:

The contracting parties will immediately upon the exchange of the ratifications of this convention bring it to the notice of the other powers and invite them to adhere to it.

This shows that the amendment was not germane as offered, was not in the right place, was not proposed to the right article or section, and, finally, article 3 had already been stricken out of the treaty on a motion by Senator Foraker, and there was no such article in existence to which Senator Bard could offer his substitute in the terms of his motion. (S. Doc. No. 85, p. 13, above referred to.) Yet this evident misinformation, carelessness, and lack of knowledge of what was actually going on concerning a very important matter, is offered as a basis for reversing the policy and history of our Nation and violating its solemn pledges to the world.

MERCHANT MARINE COMMISSION.

It is to be noted also in this connection that the Merchant Marine Commission, appointed under an act of Congress in 1904, made its report after exhaustive hearings concerning the improvement of the American merchant marine. Many plans were suggested for legislation for such purpose, and the commission consisted of very warm friends of the navigation interests; and various plans were outlined for the use of the canal construction to aid American shipping. But not one of them at that time had the hardihood to put forward a plan of preferential tolls for our ships in the canal, at the very time when the treaty was fresh in the mind of everybody.

VIEWS OF SECRETARY HAY.

As a very important part of this discussion are the views of Secretary of State John Hay, upon the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty, as submitted to the Senate in a confidential memorandum in December, 1901, as published in the New York Sun of January 27, 1911. The memorandum was quite lengthy, but its substance is as follows:

(1) With this is submitted the new treaty, which declared the neutrality of canal for the use of all nations "on terms of entire equality."

This is the treaty now in force, and it was then adopted without amendment.

(2) The United States alone adopts the rules as a basis for neutralization; and adopts and prescribes the rules by which the use of the canal shall be regulated, and assumes the entire responsibility and burden of enforcing its absolute neutrality without the assistance of Great Britain or any other nation.

(3) It was considered that war between the contracting parties or between the United States with any other power would have the ordinary effect when not specifically otherwise provided; and remit both parties to their original and natural right of self-defense, and give the United States the clear right to close the canal against the other belligerent, and to protect and defend it by whatever means might be necessary.

(4) The whole theory of the treaty is that it is to be exclusively the property of the United States, and is to be managed, controlled, and defended by it. Under these circumstances it was thought fair to omit prohibition of fortification.

(5) The sixth clause of article 3, referring to plant, etc., was inserted so that it should come within the rules of neutrality and should be respected at all times by all nations.

This illustrates the effect of the United States insisting upon a construction which withdraws its coastwise trade from the effect and provisions of the treaty.

(6) The general principle of neutrality was reaffirmed, preserved, and secured against any change of sovereignty of Panama.

(7) The President takes the position that the United States built the canal at its sole cost for the equal benefit of all nations.

(8) The general principle of neutralization and equality has always been insisted upon by the United States, and it has recognized in this way the justice of the request of Great Britain on condition that she surrendered important national and material interests in the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. So that this general principle and its application to the sovereignty of Panama should be maintained.

(9) These rules (based on neutralization and equality) are adopted in the treaty with Great Britain as a consideration for getting rid of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

(10) Upon the consideration and at the same time to put all powers on the same footing, by complying with the rules of neutrality, this section 1, article 3, was framed and adopted.

MEMORANDUM EXCLUDING ANY EXCEPTIONS.

From this elaborate and carefully prepared memorandum upon which the Senate acted in ratifying the treaty, it is clearly evident that neutrality and equality can not be separated in the construction of the treaty. That both were considered as necessary for its existence, and that Great Britain requested both as a consideration for its consent to the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and that Great Britain was entitled to so request because she surrendered important material and national interests by so doing; that this was considered just as well as a continuation of our historic policy; that the United States has the burden of operation, maintaining, and defending the canal in any way it may deem best. At the time of the negotiation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty Great Britain had some joint interests with the United States in the control of any canal constructed under the provisions of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty which the United States were extremely anxious to extinguish. On the other hand, the United States would build and control the canal solely and by itself, and Great Britain desired such condition should not be used to discriminate against its commerce, interests, or people. So an agreement was made in the form of a treaty that on condition that the joint interest and control of Great Britain should cease the commerce, interests, and people should have equal treatment with us in the use of the canal.

It is impossible for anyone to examine the elaborate and judicious statement of Secretary Hay, and then honestly and sincerely spell any exception from this memorandum as to the treaty, by which our coastwise trade shall be excluded from its provisions as to equality and neutrality. Nobody so thought at the time. It can not be done now, by any reasonable construction used anywhere else in the world, and any such forced construction would hereafter return to plague us a hundredfold, as to other matters of vast importance.

VI.

"EQUALITY OF TREATMENT" DEFINED.

It is admitted in this controversy that the exact meaning and construction of the words, section 1, article 3, "on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise," is the crux of the controversy, as to whether the American coastwise trade be included within the language as it reads, or be excluded by necessary and agreed implication.

The minority report on page 5 intimates that the interpretation of the majority is in favor of the foreign shipping interests. This is so obviously untrue as to not even require mention or denial. But it is essential to know exactly how the United States Government itself, has construed similar language with reference to such questions, since such terms appear in most of our treaties in the clauses concerning commerce and navigation.

CONSTRUCTION FORCED BY UNITED STATES.

It is fortunate that this exact question has been determined by the forced construction and contention of the United States itself concerning a treaty, also with Great Britain, relative to the canals and channels of the Great Lakes; in which the political departments of our Government, executive and legislative, contended successfully against the strenuous objection of Canada and Great Britain. The United States insisted that the words "on terms of equality" did include both coastwise and foreign commerce, trade and navigation, exactly as the majority of your committee has reported. Canada and Great Britain insisted to the contrary that the words "equality of treatment" did not include coastwise and domestic trade, commerce and traffic, exactly the position of the minority of your committee. This contention continued through several years, covered larger interests probably than would be affected by the provision as to the Panama Canal for many years in the future, was participated in by two Presidents and three Secretaries of State and both Houses of Congress, was finally won by our Government and admitted by Great Britain, that the words "on terms of equality" did include coastwise as well as foreign commerce; and that coastwise trade could not by implication be excepted from such language in any treaty by the nation which desired it. Our legislative acts declaring and insisting upon such construction are now on our statute books, are in force and ready for business, if Great Britain should again refuse to agree to our construction of such language with reference to the use of the canals about the Great Lakes.

TREATY PROVISIONS.

By article 27 of the treaty of Washington of May 8, 1871, Great Britain agreed to urge upon the Dominion of Canada, to secure to the citizens of the United States the use of the canals in the Dominion of Canada "on terms of equality" with the inhabitants of the Dominion.

In 1888, and again in 1891, representations were made by the United States that the stipulated equality in the use of the canals was denied in Canada. The tolls charged on grain, flour, and certain other articles passing through the Welland Canal amounted to 20 cents a ton, but for some years, by an annual order in council issued before the opening of lake navigation, a rebate of 18 cents a ton was granted on grain carried to Montreal or points east thereof. The effect of this system, which violated, as the United States maintained, the stipulated equality, was aggravated by the ultimate denial of any rebate on cargoes transshipped, as often as necessary, for the passage through the canal from larger to smaller vessels if the transfer was made in a United States port. On April 4, 1892, a new order in council was issued, which, while fixing the canal tolls at 20 cents a ton on freight of all kinds, allowed a rebate of 18 cents on wheat, Indian corn, peas, barley, rye, oats, flaxseed, and buckwheat originally shipped and actually carried to Montreal or any port east thereof in case such products were exported, and provided that the right to the rebate should not be lost by intermediate transshipment if it took place in Canada. By another order in council, dated April 11, 1890, and mentioned by the United States as a discrimination, the toll on cargoes bound eastward was reduced from 20 cents to 10 cents a ton, while the full rate was continued on cargoes bound westward.

The Canadian Government argued that its orders in council, as they applied to Canadian and American vessels alike, did not infringe the treaty.

The United States replied that the treaty guaranteed equality of treatment not merely to vessels of the United States, but also to their citizens; that this equality was violated by the system in question, since it required grain bound to the United States ports to pay 10 times as much toll as grain bound to Montreal and discriminated against American vessels, ports, consumers, and trade routes.

This contention was carefully investigated by Secretary Bayard, who was impressed with the justice of the claims of the shipping interests of the United States. President Cleveland then called the attention of Congress to this discrimination in his regular message, found in Foreign Relations, 1888, first volume, page 813, and by a special message to Congress August 23, 1888, House Executive Document No. 434, Fiftieth Congress, first session, page 7. The Canadians gave no heed to our demands, but continued to adhere to their construction of the treaty as to these discriminations. The administration of President Harrison again called attention of Congress to this condition, in Foreign Relations, 1892, page 277, and President Harrison submitted to Congress a special message on June 20, 1892, Senate Executive Document No. 114, Fifty-second Congress, first session, setting forth the substance of the controversy, including an elaborate report and argument on this subject by our Department of State. There is here inserted excerpts from the messages of President Harrison and the reports of the officials of the Department of State clearly stating the controversy, and its analogy to the controversy concerning the Panama Canal is obvious.

President Harrison in his message to the Senate, June 20, 1892, said, in part:

The report of Mr. Partridge, the Solicitor of the Department of State, which accompanies the letter of the Secretary of State, states these discriminations very clearly. That these orders as to canal tolls and rebates are in direct violation of article 27 of the treaty of 1871 seems to be clear. It is wholly evasive to say that there is no discrimination between Canadian and American vessels; that the rebate is allowed to both, without favor, upon grain carried through to Montreal, or transshipped at a Canadian port to Montreal. The treaty runs:

"To secure to the citizens of the United States the use of the Welland, St. Lawrence, and other canals in the Dominion on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion."

It was intended to give to consumers in the United States, to our people engaged in railroad transportation, and to those exporting from our ports equal terms in passing their merchandise through these canals. This absolute equality of treatment was the consideration for concessions on the part of this Government made in the same article of the treaty, and which have been faithfully kept. It is a matter of regret that the Canadian Government has not responded promptly to our request for the removal of these discriminating tolls.

The papers submitted show how serious the loss inflicted is upon our lake vessels and upon some of our lake ports. In view of the fact that the Canadian commissioners still contest with us the claim that these tolls are discriminating and insist that they constitute no violation of the letter or spirit of article 27 of the treaty, it would seem appropriate that Congress, if the view held by the Executive is approved, should, with deliberation and yet with promptness, take such steps as may be necessary to secure the just rights of our citizens.

Secretary of State Blaine in a letter to President Harrison April 15, 1892, in part said:

It is obviously in violation of the provisions of the twenty-seventh article of the treaty of 1871.

Solicitor of State Department Partridge to Secretary of State Blaine, April 14, 1892, stated in part:

Although the circumstances in the case required that article 27 of the treaty of 1871 should take the form which it did, it can not be doubted that it was intended to secure thereby complete equality to the citizens of each country in the use of the canals of the other necessary to the navigation of the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence River.

This order discriminates against our citizens in at least three respects:

(1) In that it makes the toll on grain for export from Montreal and other Canadian ports east of Montreal 2 cents per ton, while the toll on grain for export from American ports is 20 cents per ton.

(2) In that even the lesser rate is refused on grain for Montreal and ports east, if it has been transshipped at a Canadian port.

(3) In that the 2-cent rate only is levied on grain for Montreal and ports east from any Canadian Lake Ontario port, while the 20-cent rate is exacted on grain for the same destination from American Lake Ontario ports. This is a new discrimination not contained in the order of March 25, 1891.

Recently this subject was again presented to the department quite fully by a memorial from the Lake Carriers' Association of Buffalo, N. Y., dated September 18, 1891. Since then memorials have also been received from the Milwaukee Chamber of Commerce, Chicago Board of Trade, the Cleveland Board of Trade, the Detroit Board of Trade, the Oswego Board of Trade, the Rochester Chamber of Commerce, and from other associations and individuals.

It does not relieve the position of the Dominion Government with respect to the grain rebate, that considerable of the grain carried to Montreal and the East is shipped from ports of the United States, and that, the transportation of such grain being open to American vessels, they can secure the rebate on the same conditions on which it is given to Canadian vessels. * * * An equality in the use of the canals to American vessels would not alone satisfy the conditions of the treaty. The distinction between the vessel and the cargo is recognized by the Canadian Government, which exact distinct tolls for each. Neither does the treaty provide for equality in tolls only. The conditions imposed upon the use of the canals discriminate against American shippers and consumers, American transportation companies and routes, and American ports. This present practice of the Canadian Government is probably even a greater discrimination against our citizens than if directed against our vessels.

President Harrison in his message to the Senate July 1, 1892, said in part:

The position taken by this Government, as expressed in my previous communication to the Senate, that the equal tolls and regulations of which complaint has been made are in violation of our treaty with Great Britain, is not shaken but rather confirmed. There can be no doubt that a serious discrimination against our citizens and our commerce exists, and quite as little doubt that this discrimination is not the incident but the purpose of Canadian regulations.

Mr. Herbert, of the British legation, Washington, D. C., to Acting Secretary of State Wharton, June 24, 1892, stated in part:

The effect of this order in council is to fix the rate of toll on all of the specified products passing through the Welland Canal and the St. Lawrence canals, without discrimination as to nationality. Vessels of both countries are entitled to the rebate and also to transship, provided that such transshipment be made at a Canadian port. If, however, the transshipment takes place at an American port, the vessel loses its right to the rebate. And the loss of rebate would apply equally to both Canadian and American vessels. In like manner, the vessels of neither country would obtain rebate should they land at a point short of Montreal, either on the American or Canadian side.

* * * In favoring their national route the Canadian Government do so on precisely the same conditions with regard to both nations, and they contend, therefore, that they have acted in accordance with the obligations which Great Britain has requested them to take under article 27 of the treaty of Washington. The stipulation in that article is that the United States citizens shall use the Canadian canals on terms of equality with the people of the Dominion. And this equality is, in the opinion of the Canadian Government, preserved by the imposition of the same conditions and the granting of the same privileges, with the same restrictions, to vessels of both nationalities.

A memorandum by Assistant Secretary of State Adee, June 28, 1892, contained in part:

If the object were to favor the use of the Canadian canals and that object was carried out impartially, citizens of the United States would have little or no cause to complain. Moreover, the defense of the Canadian Government is confined to alleging that no discrimination, in fact, is made between Canadian and United States vessels carrying the favored cargoes through the canals, when the treaty of Washington makes the treatment of citizens the sole test of equality in the use of the canals. That the order does favor and is intended to favor the citizens of Canada at the expense of citizens of the United States is clear, looking at the order as a whole. Were the purpose of fostering the Canadian export trade accomplished by a bounty to the vessels carrying grain cargoes from the St. Lawrence ocean ports the case might be different, but the purpose is effected by levying differential tolls in and for the use of the Welland and St. Lawrence River Canals, so that the encouragement of the export trade is converted into such a discrimination against the enjoyment of the canals by citizens of the United States as the treaty of Washington expressly aimed to guard against.

As to this the Canadian reply merely says "the loss of rebate would apply equally to both Canadian and American vessels," thus narrowing the contention to the equal treatment of vessels and ignoring the engagements of the treaty as to the equal treatment of citizens.

* * * The order is in this regard a naked discrimination against the American citizen, for the enforcement of which the canal tolls are employed as a convenient instrument.

As to the traffic passing through the St. Lawrence River canals, a third discrimination exists which is in absolute and open violation of the intent of the treaty, for if the starting point of the grain cargo for export be a Canadian Lake Ontario port, the toll is but 2 cents per ton, while the 20-cent rate is exacted on grain for the same destination from the American Lake Ontario ports. * * *

The Canadian Government is, therefore, silent as to this, perhaps the most intentionally vexatious discrimination against the stipulated privilege of citizens of the United States to use the Canadian canals "on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion."

PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS.

Bills providing for retaliation against such discrimination on the part of Canada, and representing the views of the Department of State, were introduced in the Senate by Senator Davis, of Minnesota, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and in the House by Representative Blount, of Georgia, then chairman of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs. The committee favorably and unanimously reported such bill without amendment, and Judge Blount, in his report, indorsed and included the very able and comprehensive report of Solicitor Partridge and Assistant Secretary of the Department of State Adee, and in addition stated as follows:

The treaty of 1871 permits Canadian citizens the use of St. Marys Canal on the same terms as our own citizens. It opens St. Clair Channel on the same terms. This the Canadian enjoys in all his comprehensiveness. It was expected that the Welland and other canals in Canada would be open to American citizens on the same terms.

This would enable the traffic which debouches from our territory into the Great Lakes to find an outlet into Ontario ports and the Atlantic Ocean on equality as to charges with the Canadian citizen. The same principle would apply as to products and tonnage on the return traffic. Following the report of Solicitor Partridge, Mr. Blount concludes: "All efforts to secure a just interpretation of all treaty rights of American citizens have been met in a spirit of evasion, avoidance, and delay. Such conduct is notably dishonest in purpose and deceitful in method, but almost reaches the point of contumely and insult."

This vigorous language characterizes the exact construction of a treaty and the exact contention now made by the minority of your committee.

PROCEEDINGS IN HOUSE.

On the 21st day of July, 1892, the bill came before the House for consideration, and Judge Blount, the chairman of the committee, and Mr. Hitt, of Illinois, the ranking Republican member of the committee, both discussed the bill, calling attention to the outrageous discriminations and violation of the treaty by Canada and urging this measure of retaliation. Following are extracts from their remarks upon this bill, found in CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Fifty-second Congress, first session, page 6531 et seq.

Mr. Blount said in part:

The President of the United States has in two messages during this session of Congress called the attention of the Congress of the United States to the conditions of the rights of American citizens in the use of the Welland, St. Lawrence, and other Canadian canals. The twenty-seventh article of the treaty was intended to give our own citizens the same right to use these canals that was accorded to the citizens of Canada.

It was claimed on the part of the Canadian Government that as the rebate applied to "vessels," and our vessels were covered by its terms, provided their cargoes took the lines indicated by the order, there was absolute "equality"; but the language of the treaty shows that it had relation not only to vessels but to citizens. It was intended for the benefit of the consumers in our own country; it was intended to give advantages to our ports; it was intended to give advantages to our transportation companies. The Canadians have sought by this technical construction to evade the spirit of the treaty. The proposition in the pending bill is to allow the President of the United States to prescribe tolls to be levied at the St. Marys Canal on products passing through there, and also to provide that those tolls shall not operate against American vessels plying to ports within our own territory.

The object is to apply to Canadian citizens using that canal a rule similar to that which the Canadians apply to American citizens using their canals. It is expected that in this way we shall secure a recognition of our rights under the treaty. It is believed that the result of this course on the part of our Government will be to put an end to the delay and evasion which has characterized the negotiations of the Canadian commissioners with our State Department upon this subject and to compel on the part of Canada a recognition of our rights under the treaty.

* * * The President of the United States, interpreting this treaty, says:

"The treaty runs to secure to the citizens of the United States the use of the Welland, St. Lawrence, and other canals in the Dominion on terms of equality with inhabitants of the Dominion. It was intended to give to consumers in the United States, to our own people engaged in railroad transportation, and to those exporting from our ports, equal terms in passing their merchandise through these canals."

If this is a correct interpretation—and I believe it is—why should we submit to a ruinous and wrongful interpretation?

The bill provides simply for the application of the same rule laid down by the Canadian authorities in reference to their own merchandise—nothing more, nothing less. Let them conform to the terms of the treaty, and the President has no power. But we have had first one evasion and then another; we have had delays and misunderstandings. But no Canadian, if he and his government act rightly, is harmed thereby.

Mr. Hitt said in part:

Mr. Speaker, this bill is one which deeply concerns our people in the Northwest and the North and the exporting cities of the East. It is intended to prevent the continuance of a gross injustice, to redress by retaliation a great wrong to the grain interest, to secure a treaty right to which we are entitled and for which we have paid and are paying. Our people send their vast crops to the East by lake and by canal and by concurrent railroads for export. These crops pass in almost immeasurable volume by water during the season of water navigation. The passage from Lake Erie to Lake Ontario is by the Welland Canal. By our treaty with Great Britain, the words which have just been read to the House, we are entitled to "the use of that canal on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion of Canada."

We keep faith; but while we do this how is it upon that Welland Canal, upon which we are entitled to equality of treatment? Every ton of cargo that passes through the Welland Canal to the American port for export is, in fact, charged exactly ten times the toll that is exacted upon the cargo that is to be exported from a Canadian port. That is the interpretation which a Canadian ministry gives to the words of a treaty so simple that a child could not mistake its meaning.

Yet the provisions in the Canadian treaty requiring equality and prohibiting discrimination were not nearly so clear and comprehensive as in the Panama treaty. The bill was then passed unanimously. In the Senate it was favorably reported from the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations by Senator Frye, of Maine, and was passed unanimously by the Senate on the 22d day of July, 1892, and signed by President Harrison on the 26th day of July, 1892.

RETALIATION.

Under it, on the 18th day of August, 1892, President Harrison issued a proclamation making retaliation for such discrimination. This caused Canada and Great Britain to recede from their action and revise their previous obnoxious construction of the provisions of the treaty. So, on the 21st day of February, 1893, the President withdrew the retaliation. Thus was established by the action of both Governments, the construction by legislative and executive action that the words "equality of treatment" includes both coastwise and foreign trade as to all vessels, citizens and subjects, ports and places, and trade and routes and traffic.

LAW YET IN FORCE.

The act of retaliation is yet on the statute books of the United States, Twenty-seventh Statutes at Large, page 267, being chapter 248, Fifty-second Congress, first session; and may be found on page 153, Navigation Laws of the United States, 1907, and is construed by the War Department as yet in force and can be made effective at any moment should the occasion require.

CONSTRUCTION BY UNITED STATES.

Here is a recent authoritative construction by the United States itself, and by all its political departments on behalf of our own citizens, our own commerce and interests, that the words "equality of treatment" in the British treaty of 1871 included both coastwise and foreign trade and vessels, citizens, ports, and traffic. This contention and construction was insisted upon by Presidents Cleveland and Harrison and by Secretaries of State Bayard, Blaine, and Foster. The House and Senate committees by report, and the two Houses separately and unanimously sustained such construction and contention, and their act is yet upon the statute books and expresses the legislative and executive judgment and will upon such subject. Great Britain and Canada yielded reluctantly to such construction, but they finally acquiesced, and for 20 years it has met the acceptation of all.

SAME OFFICIALS IN BOTH TREATIES.

During this controversy, many of the American and British officials took part in this matter, who subsequently participated in the framing and ratification of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. They were familiar with all of the phases of the exhaustive contention; and this may explain the extremely careful and definite terms in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty on this point, as against the shorter and more doubtful language in the earlier treaty of 1871. The language of the latter was to secure the citizens of the United States the use of the canal, etc., on "terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion." This language, by agreement and through our own construction, includes coastwise and foreign vessels, commerce, citizens and subjects, places and ports, routes and traffic. Many of these same officials five years later, began the draft of a new treaty between the same nations, concerning the Interoceanic Canal, which was concluded eight years later; in which is found the language, "the canal shall be free and open to the commerce and war vessels of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise." It is to be noted that the language is far broader and stronger to prevent any possible discrimination or difference than in the earlier treaty; and undoubtedly was so done in view of the very controversy above described, and to prevent any possible recurrence of misunderstanding in the future.

RELIGIOUS OBSERVANCE OF TREATIES.

The minority stated, on page 7 of their report, that they—

Believe in the religious observance of our treaty obligations as essential to the maintenance of our own self-respect and the confidence and friendly regard of the other nations, but we refuse to assent to the mere suggestion, to say nothing of the bold declaration, that by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty we have without consideration bartered away to a foreign nation the constitutional power of the United States to regulate commerce between the United States, and encourage the upbuilding and growth of our domestic shipping.

In other words, these gentlemen seem to believe that it would be a religious observance of our treaty obligations to insist upon the construction of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, concerning canals, and so forth, on the Great Lakes, so that the words "equality of treatment" must include all coastwise vessels, trade, ports, and citizens (of both nations), and that such construction must be continued in force so it may be effective at any time now and in the future.

SIMILAR TERMS CONSTRUED.

But in another treaty also between the United States and Great Britain, made eight years later, concerning Panama waters, in which very many of the same officials of both nations participated, that the words "on terms of entire equality * * * so that there shall be no discrimination against any nation, its citizens or subjects in respect of charges or conditions of traffic or otherwise," much stronger and broader language, must not include our own coastwise vessels, citizens, subjects, commerce, trade, routes, and traffic, but must include those of Great Britain.

It is unfortunate that Mr. Pecksniff could not now be embodied, so that he could sincerely congratulate the minority of the committee upon this delicious exposition of hypocrisy and humbuggery.

OPINION OF SECRETARY HAY.

The minority states that—

We have without consideration bartered away to a foreign nation the constitutional power of the United States to regulate commerce between the United States and encourage the upbuilding and growth of American shipping.

As against such assertion, it might be well to place the carefully considered statements of Secretary of State Hay to the Senate previous to the ratification of this very treaty—that Great Britain by this treaty surrendered important national interests, and as a consideration for which, and in further carrying out the historic and unvarying policy of our country, we place in this treaty beyond dispute the general principles of "neutralization and equality."

Senator Davis in his very able report upon this same treaty strongly supports the position of Secretary Hay.

This plain enunciation of principles sustained the full contention of our Government less than 10 years before, that such language included the foreign and coastwise vessels, citizens and subjects, ports and places, traffic and routes of both nations.

It may be charitable to ascribe to the minority ignorance of our recent history and of the basis for important public action, as stated by the high responsible officials of our Government.

But the policy of our Nation in its treatment of the greatest public work of the ages can not well be predicated upon the combination of that, together with the greed of some petty commercial interests who hope to gain some profit by betrayal of the honor of their country.

VII.

SUEZ CANAL RULES.

It is an elementary rule in the construction of treaties and statutes, that where the provision in question has been copied from those of another nation or state, where such provision has received a careful construction, that such construction would be of great value in considering the proper construction of the borrowed section. In this instance article 3 of the treaty provides "that the United States adopts as a basis of the neutralization of such ship canal the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed October 28, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal. That is to say," then follow the six sections laying down the rules of neutralization and equality which shall apply to the Panama Canal, as may be seen from the text of the treaty annexed to these remarks.

SUEZ ARTICLES.

The article in the Suez convention relating to charges and tolls is as follows:

ART. 10. The high contracting parties, by application of the principle of equality as regards the free use of the canal (a principle which forms one of the bases of the present treaty), agree that none of them shall endeavor to obtain, with respect to the canal, territorial or commercial advantage or privileges in any international arrangements which may be concluded. Moreover, the rights of Turkey as the territorial power are reserved.

Other sections contain substantially the same provisions as in the other sections of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

CONSTRUCTION OF RULES.

These sections have always been construed to forbid any discrimination in favor of or against the coastwise vessels or trade of any of the contracting nations; and though Great Britain really has the controlling voice in the management of the canal, and France is the headquarters of the management, yet their vessels pay and are treated exactly the same as all others. Of course, Turkey is specifically excepted. But in the case of the Panama Canal, there was no specific exception and none can be fairly implied, any more than in the case of the Suez Canal.

It is true that some nations do pay specific amounts to their own steamship companies to help defray the tolls and charges at Suez, and some propose to do the same at Panama. This is clearly allowed by the provisions in both treaties, and Secretary Adee, in his argument upon the Canadian controversy, clearly pointed out the difference between the payment of a bounty or a subsidy directly to the vesssel, citizen, or traffic from the Public Treasury; and that of the remission of tolls to a particular class as an act of favoritism. Each nation can regulate its own policy as to the former method; while as to the latter, the public action would be entirely within the power of one nation. In the payment of subsidies or bounties, each nation determines its own policy for itself. And so all are placed upon an equality, exactly as provided by the treaty must be done. But if one nation, controlling the canal, determines to let through its own vessels free of tolls for any reason which may seem good to it, at once a gross inequality and discrimination arises which the treaty clearly prohibits. This is the difference between the policies, which is substantial and conclusive; and in all justice ought to be observed, as the United States pledged it would do with reference to this treaty.

Equality can only be obtained by actually compelling all vessels to be treated exactly alike as they pass through the canal; and unless this equality can be obtained, neutrality can not be. They must accompany each other necessarily and so do, unless expressly agreed and reserved as in the case of Turkey as to the Suez Canal. So, if the construction and application of the Panama treaty follows the construction and application of the Suez treaty, upon which it is based and after which it is framed, then there can be no exception or implication in favor of or against anybody or interest; but all must be treated exactly alike, as both treaties expressly provide, and as the Suez management actually does.

The Commissioner of Navigation, in his annual report for 1911, on page 12, stated as follows:

The river and harbor act of 1884 was passed in the full knowledge that Congress, of course, could have imposed tolls on all vessels using any of the improved waterways on which so much has since been expended, just as Germany imposes tolls for the navigation of the Kaiser Wilhelm Canal. It was passed with the knowledge that if it chose to impose such tolls Congress must impose them on American vessels as well as foreign vessels, for the United States and all other maritime nations make no discrimination on account of the flag.

And, further, on page 17, he said, in part:

Our treaties of amity, commerce, and navigation usually contain a special article on the coastwise trade. Thus article 13 of our treaty of February 21, 1911, with Japan, our latest important treaty, provides: "The coasting trade of the high contracting parties is excepted from the provisions of the present treaty and shall be regulated according to the laws of the United States and Japan, respectively."

There is no such article in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and there is no need to read such an article into the treaty. Within its concise provisions the Frye bill has provided fully for the coastwise trade as well as for foreign trade and for merchant vessels as well as for public vessels of the United States. That bill, in brief, is based on the belief that in accord with our treaties every nation, including the United States, will contribute to the support of the canal in proportion to the use it makes of it. Each nation is free to choose the manner in which it will make its contribution. All other nations, of course, will adopt the same method of making the contribution in behalf of their vessels of war, namely, by direct appropriation from their treasuries. Nations will differ as to the manner in which they will provide for the contributions in behalf of their vessels of commerce. Some will require each shipowner to pay, himself, the tolls on his vessels and look to his freight and passengers to recoup himself. Other nations will pay subsidies to some of their ships or navigation bounties to all of them sufficient to pay in whole or in part the canal tolls. Still others will appropriate specified amounts to pay the tolls of specific steamship companies. The Frye bill proposes that the American people shall pay and American merchant ships and their cargoes shall not pay tolls, but shall enjoy the navigation of the canal precisely as they now enjoy untaxed the navigation of a thousand improved American harbors, rivers, lakes, and canals.

These citations, from one of the most intelligent, ablest, and strongest advocates of assistance by Congress for our merchant marine, show conclusively that any assistance must be granted by appropriations therefor by Congress, and that it can not be honorably or decently done by remission of tolls to our own vessels in contravention to the express terms of our treaties.

VIII.

CANAL TREATIES WITH LATIN COUNTRIES.

The continuous and historic policy of the United States as to equality of tolls on the Panama Canal, can be well understood and illustrated by its previous action concerning this subject with the various Latin-American countries. There are two phases: First, the negotiations, treaties, and attempted agreements between the United States and the various Latin nations, with reference to the construction of the canal. Second, the construction and contention of the United States in such treaties and agreements, with reference to equality of treatment between the citizens, commerce, and vessels of the United States and the various nations.

LIST OF AGREEMENTS.

Following is a partial list of treaties, attempted treaties, and negotiations between the United States and the various Latin-American nations, with reference to the construction of an interoceanic canal; United States with New Granada, ratified June 10, 1848; United States with Colombia, concluded January 14, 1869; United States with Colombia, concluded January 26, 1870; United States with Colombia, concluded August 8, 1873; United States with Colombia, concluded February 17, 1881.

All of these treaties contained in substance the provision in the thirty-fifth article of the original treaty of 1846, securing to all nations the free and equal right of passage of the interoceanic waterway.

The United States with Honduras, concluded July 4, 1864. Same as in the preceding treaties with New Granada. United States with Nicaragua, concluded June 21, 1849; United States with Nicaragua, concluded September 3, 1849; United States with Nicaragua, concluded November 16, 1857; United States with Nicaragua, concluded June 20, 1869; United States with Nicaragua, concluded February 28, 1877.

These contain either the language of the New Granada treaty of 1848 with reference to tolls, or such as the following: "For all vessels on equal terms in every respect as between each other." This has been invariably construed by all nations and all administrations, as embracing both coastwise and foreign vessels and commerce of both nations.

TREATY FOR COASTWISE PREFERENCE.

The treaty of the United States with Nicaragua, concluded December 1, 1884, known as the Frelinghuysen-Zalaya treaty, contained the provision "equal tolls for the vessels of all nations." "Excepting the vessels of the contracting parties engaged in the coastwise trade."

The draft of this treaty is very important to consider in this controversy for this reason, that it conclusively shows that all previous treaties containing the words "equal terms" or their equivalent, included both coastwise and foreign vessels and trade, and that the United States did not contend or expect that a construction of such terms could imply that its own coastwise trade was to be necessarily excluded by implication. No one thought of such a construction. But on the contrary, when it was desired by our Government that its coastwise trade should be excluded from the general provision as to "equal terms to all nations," it was found necessary to expressly provide for such exclusion, as was done in the Frelinghuysen-Zalaya treaty. This was the rule which was followed in the controversy between the United States and Canada over the treaty of 1871, above referred to, and it is also the rule of construction of the Suez convention, in which the rights of Turkey were expressly reserved.

This additional fact is significant also that, together with the express exception of its coastwise trade, there is no provision in the treaty for its neutralization, showing that our officials realized that such could not be granted by the nations where favoritism is openly exacted.

GENERAL RULE CONSTRUCTION.

It is the general rule in the construction of all treaties and among all nations that the general rule should include all matters fairly within its terms and that any exception from the policy must be expressly noted. Never has this rule of construction been seriously controverted, until in the present discussion concerning tolls in the Panama Canal.

The United States negotiated with Costa Rica, in 1876; with provisions the same as Nicaragua.

FAVORED-NATION CLAUSES.

The treaties of Costa Rica and Nicaragua with other nations contained the most-favored-nation clauses, which would have extended the privilege for free or preferential tolls to the coastwise trade of most nations, under the old canal treaties, if such a principle had been adopted as is contained in the minority report. This suggestion alone, would have ruined any chance for the construction of an interoceanic canal by any company. Yet the terms of those treaties are not as sweeping concerning equal treatment, as the general requirement for "entire equality, without discrimination as to any such nation," etc., in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

CONSTRUCTION BY UNITED STATES.

It is next important to ascertain in what manner the United States has itself construed and insisted upon a construction of those treaties with Latin America, with reference to the rights of equal treatment between its own citizens and those of the other nations. The basis of nearly all of the Latin American treaties with the United States is the original treaty with New Granada of 1846, ratified in 1848. The treaty was lengthy, but the substance of it, so far as this controversy is concerned, is contained in article 35, which provides, in substance, "that the citizens, commerce, and navigation of the United States shall be subject to the same tolls, charges, and duties as the citizens of New Granada." Under this treaty, soon after its ratification, there was much commerce, coastwise in character, principally to California, and many charges of discrimination and unfair treatment were made by citizens of the United States against New Granada and Colombia. (See pp. 103, 115, 119, 123, and 124, vol. 3, Moore Dig. Int. Law.)

TREATMENT NOT EQUAL.

The basis of the complaints were nearly always that the Republic of New Granada or the representatives of its local governments did not treat the citizens or commerce or mails of the United States on the same or on equal terms with its own.

The United States Government has always been strenuous and continuous for such contention and construction, not only with the Latin countries but with Canada; and such contentions then related principally to the same class of trade, which now demands preferential treatment at our own hands, that between the two coasts, as our own domestic commerce. At that time those engaged in such business demanded that our Government should construe the treaties, as requiring the Central American nations to treat our people, vessels, and trade exactly as they did or should their own. Now the same class of domestic commerce strongly urges us to reverse such a policy, and abandon such traditions in the construction of far stronger and broader language in the Panama Canal treaty, promising entire equality and forbidding any discriminations, which we have sacredly pledged ourselves to observe by the words "to the end that the same and every article and clause thereof may be observed and fulfilled by the United States and the citizens thereof."

COASTWISE TRADE SEEKS DEFENSE.

The coastwise trade between the two coasts had a right in years past to demand the full protection of our Government and its treaties, that their provisions for equal treatment should include and defend them in the coastwise business in their immensely profitable ventures and in the wonderful development of our western shores. But what could be more shameless now, when it seems to be for their profit, that they seek an abandonment of the just and historic construction of the language "equality of treatment," a reversal of our policies and traditions which in the past they so besought and have so benefited them, so that they may now gain a little something additional, by the violation of the principles of justice and fair dealing?

IX.

GENERAL TREATIES WITH OTHER LATIN AMERICAN NATIONS.

No treaty or public act of any nation can be considered or construed separately and independently and by itself. It must be realized that it is only a part of a continuous history and policy of a Government. The greatest future development through the opening of the Panama Canal is expected to be on the Pacific Coast; and the region where the United States would have a natural advantage in the extension of its commerce would be with those nations which have ports on the Pacific. The relations between these governments and our own must be of prime importance in the consideration of what benefits can be hoped and expected through the opening of the canal. These nations have expressed themselves many times and in many ways, as most friendly with the United States, and have been profoundly grateful to our Government for the construction of the canal and conferring such inestimable benefits upon them and mankind.

RESOLUTION OF GRATITUDE.

Perhaps this is best expressed by a resolution adopted at the Pan American Conference at the City of Mexico on the 22d day of January, 1902, as follows:

> The Republics assembled at the International Conference of Mexico applaud the purpose of the United States Government to construct an interoceanic canal and acknowledge that this work will not only be worthy of the greatness of the American people, but also in the highest sense a work of civilization, and to the highest degree beneficial to the development of commerce between the American States and other countries of the world.

That splendid evidence of good feeling has continued, and the trips to and through those nations of Secretaries Root and Knox have greatly increased and intensified it, and they are now ready to meet and greet the United States, its people, and commerce on terms of the utmost cordiality, to the mutual advantage of all. This sentiment has been expressed most forcibly and felicitously by Secretary Knox in his brilliant address at San Francisco on the evening of Tuesday, May 7.

COAST LINES OF NATIONS.

The following nations front on the Atlantic and Pacific coast lines: Great Britain, United States, Mexico, Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, Panama, Colombia, while Salvador, Ecuador, and Peru have connections by waterways which may not be of much importance. As Secretary Knox, in his address, stated:

> In the case of those States fronting on the two oceans, like Colombia, Panama, and four of the five Central American Republics, its immediate effect, like that so far as the United States and Mexico are concerned, is to give them a virtually continuous water frontage on both seas.

These nations have a deep interest in the treatment of their coastwise trade through the Panama Canal, and of the construction by the United States of the canal treaties, as to the treatment of their and our coastwise trade.

THEY KNOW CONSTRUCTION OF TREATIES.

They are well acquainted with the section in the canal treaty providing for "terms of entire equality, without discrimination, to all nations observing the rules," and they well know the traditional policy of the United States in its insistence that the language "terms of entire equality" must include both foreign and coastwise trade, unless the coastwise be specifically excepted; and they know that no such exception exists in the canal treaty. They are well informed as to the consideration and potent reasons as set forth in the official utterances of our Government and responsible officials, as to why "equality to all" was justly promised and granted by the language of the treaty. They know, too, that in the treaties between the United States and several of these nations may be found the following article:

The two high contracting parties, being likewise desirous of placing the commerce and navigation of their respective countries on the liberal basis of perfect equality and reciprocity, mutually agree that the citizens of each, etc., shall enjoy all the rights, privileges, and exemptions in navigation and commerce which native citizens do and shall enjoy, etc. But it is understood that this article does not include the coasting trade of either country, the regulation of which is reserved by the parties respectively according to their own separate laws.

The following nations have a similar article in their treaties with the United States: Brazil, Central America, Ecuador, Colombia, Guatemala, and Salvador, and the others have something similar, expressing about the same idea.

ARTICLE REQUIRES EQUALITY.

The substance of the article is, that commerce and navigation of the two nations shall be on a basis of perfect equality and reciprocity, and the citizens and commerce of the two nations shall enjoy the same rights, privileges, and immunities. The Panama Canal treaty is equally broad in its treatment of commerce and the citizens of all nations on terms of "entire equality without discrimination."

It would seem in all fairness that the construction of all such treaties should be that the same privileges, rights, and immunities should extend equally to all trade and commerce of all these peoples and of all of these nations; and if there be desired any exception to such general terms that such exception be plainly and fairly set forth. That is exactly what was done as to the coastwise trade in every other treaty except the canal treaty. In other treaties it was agreed that all commerce and navigation, except coastwise, should be treated exactly alike. In the canal treaty it was so agreed with no exception, so it would seem the general terms would include the coastwise business because not expressly excluded. The proposition for such an exception was often discussed and contended for, and was once contained in one of the drafts of a treaty with Nicaragua; but the treaty before us does not contain it. It would seem impossible to justify such construction as contended by the minority, on any basis of fair and honest dealing with those nations and peoples. But if we do so except our coastwise trade, in all fairness we should equally except the coastwise trade of all of these nations with whom we have had such relations in the past.

IMPOSSIBLE FOR EXCEPTION.

And this would be impossible, because the favored-nation clauses would thus practically embrace nearly all nations. This would leave only tolls on exclusively foreign commerce, and the large part of the necessary revenues of the canal would be lost. Yet that is the only fair deduction from the construction and demands of the minority; or forfeit the respect of all these other nations as well as our own self-respect. If we do not follow such a course, then complaints as to the unfairness and discriminations and violations of our various treaties will at once commence.

NATIONS WILL DISCRIMINATE.

Various nations will at once begin to discriminate in some way or other, against the citizens and commerce of the United States in favor of their own citizens and commerce, and in favor of citizens and commerce of their friends and those who treat them fairly. When we point to our treaty rights and ask for redress, we will be met with our own construction of the words "entire equality of treatment of all nations without discrimination," as implied by exempting our own citizens and commerce from its effect. They can then inform us, that similar language in their treaties must also exempt their own citizens and commerce from the obligations of them; that if we implied that exceptions can exist when we want to make them; they can also insist upon their existence when they want to make them in favor of their own people.

RIVAL NATIONS INCITE.

Rival nations in the commercial world, can and undoubtedly would use such a situation and such a construction as a means to excite hostility and discrimination against the United States, our people, and commerce; and they could easily use the cloak of local interests by such construction, to really bring about a discrimination for their own benefit. This condition may be expected, if we refuse to abide by our own agreements and violate the plain principles of fair dealing and decency.

SUCH CONSTRUCTION INJURES OUR PEOPLE.

The construction of the Panama Canal treaty, as it would be by the minority, would bind the hands of the Government and render it helpless to protect our own people and commerce in such a class of cases. The losses which must ensue to our own people and from the humiliation to our Nation, would be many times greater than any possible benefit which could possibly accrue from any policy of evasion and dishonesty. Indeed, it would be probable that every commercial organization which now demands such discriminating construction of our canal treaty, would be foremost to complain when their own medicine should be administered to their own members and interests, under similar language in the commercial treaties with other nations. It might be well to look before we leap in this tremendously important matter of construction of this treaty.

It is always well to remember that honesty and fair dealing of our own with other nations will be productive of the peace, good will, advancement, and prosperity to all people and to all nations; and this broad and patriotic policy and its attending results has always been the fond hope of the promoters of this great work from its beginning.

X.

TREATIES WITH OTHER NATIONS.

A somewhat similar situation exists with the other commercial nations of the world. The language of most treaties is nearly the same, and the same construction is given to the terms used in these agreements. Everyone who is interested, realizes what these customary terms mean, and the foreign and political departments of this Government have always followed the accepted usage of all commercial nations, in interpreting such terms and construing such provisions. It has been the uniform course of our Government, of Presidents and Secretaries of State, ambassadors and ministers, of Congress and courts to construe the terms "equal treatment," "equality of treatment," "on equal terms," and "equal and equality," referring to commerce, trade, and navigation as including all of the class and excluding none by implication unless expressly reserved, so there can be no misunderstanding about it.

TERMS GENERAL AND INCLUSIVE.

This is evident, since an examination of the treaties of the United States and the general terms in those agreements, referring to commerce and navigation, is nearly always general and inclusive; and the general terms have been invariably construed to include coastwise commerce within such provision. That this is true must be realized, because whenever it has been desired to exclude coastwise business from the general language as to commerce and navigation, express words to such effect have been inserted in such treaties. The list of commercial treaties, containing such reservations of coastwise commerce, is given in the testimony of Commissioner Chamberlain, page 878, volume 3, Hearings before the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce on the Panama Canal. Unless such exception be expressly made, it is evident that the general rule laid down in the treaty must apply to both foreign and coastwise trade.

CANAL TREATY WITHOUT QUALIFICATION.

In the canal treaty, the terms were most general, with no qualifications or exceptions. The language included all nations, all vessels, all trades, all citizens, with no discrimination against any of them or exception in favor of any nation, trade, or interest. This rule was inserted not only because such had been the historic and uniform policy of our country as to the interoceanic waterways, but because in all fairness and justice it should be done by us when other nations had yielded to us valuable rights, at our request, for this purpose. Under these circumstances, and viewing the long and uniform course of diplomatic dealings of this country, whereby coastwise trade was expressly excluded from the provisions of our treaties when it was desired that it should so be excluded, and when not so expressly excluded, should be deemed to be included within the broad and general provisions, it does not seem possible that any exception now can be fairly implied from such plain language, or admitted by the authorities of any nation.

XI.

MINORITY OBJECTIONS.

USE OF CANAL BY WAR VESSELS OF THE UNITED STATES AND PANAMA.

The minority urges strongly that because the pending bill provides for the free use of the canal by vessels of war of the United States and Panama, that equally we could provide for its free use by domestic vessels in coastwise trade. As a basis for such contention is a statement "that such a construction is inconsistent with the very purpose of the canal, which was conceived primarily as a military necessity." Those who signed such a statement seem to be unfamiliar with the history and purpose of our interoceanic canal. There are here cited some expressions from our statesmen who had the responsibility of conducting the affairs of this Government with reference to the canal to show the fallacy and error of such a statement.

Senate resolution, 1835:

* * * The construction of a ship canal across the Isthmus which connects North and South America, and of securing forever by such stipulations the free and equal right of navigating such canal to all such nations. * * *

House resolution, 1839:

* * * For the purpose of ascertaining the practicability of effecting a communication between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by the construction of a ship canal across the Isthmus and of securing forever, by suitable treaty stipulations, the free and equal right of navigating such canal to all nations.

This resolution was unanimously agreed to by the House.

Treaty of 1846:

* * * Any modes of communication that now exist, or that may be hereafter constructed, shall be open and free to the Government and citizens of the United States, and for the transportation of any articles of produce, manufactures, or merchandise of lawful commerce belonging to the citizens of the United States; that no other tolls or charges shall be levied or collected upon the citizens of the United States, or their said merchandise thus passing over any road or canal that may be made by the Government of New Granada, or by the authority of the same, than is, under like circumstances, levied upon and collected from the Granadian citizens. * * *

President Polk's message:

It will constitute no alliance for any political object, but for a purely commercial purpose in which all the navigating nations of the world have a common interest.

In entering into mutual guaranties proposed by the thirty-fifth article of the treaty, neither the Government of New Granada nor that of the United States has any narrow or exclusive views. The ultimate object, as presented by the Senate of the United States in their resolution (of March 3, 1835) to which I have already referred, is to secure to all nations the free and equal right of passage over the Isthmus.

Secretary of State Lewis Cass:

While the rights of sovereignty of the local governments must always be respected, other rights also have arisen in the progress of events involving interests of great magnitude to the commercial world, and demanding its careful attention and, if need be, its efficient protection. In view of these interests and after having invited capital and enterprise from other countries to aid in the opening in these great highways of nations under pledges of free transit to all desiring it, it can not be permitted that these Governments should exercise over them an arbitrary and unlimited control, or close them or embarrass them without reference to the wants of commerce or the intercourse of the world. Equally disastrous would it be to leave them at the mercy of every nation which, in time of war, might find it advantageous for hostile purposes to take possession of them and either restrain their use or suspend it altogether.

The President hopes that by the general consent of the maritime powers all such difficulties may be prevented, and the interoceanic lines, with the harbors of immediate approach to them, may be secured beyond interruption to the great purposes for which they were established.

Negotiations of Secretary of State Fish:

* * * A Darien Canal should not be regarded as hostile to a Suez Canal; they will be not so much rivals as joint contributors to the increase of the commerce of the world, and thus mutually advance each other's interests. * * *

We shall * * * be glad of any movement which shall result in the early decision of the question of the most practicable route and the early commencement and speedy completion of an interoceanic communication, which shall be guaranteed in its perpetual neutralization and dedication to the commerce of all nations, without advantages to one over another of those who guarantee its assured neutrality. * * *

* * * the benefit of neutral waters at the ends thereof for all classes of vessels entitled to fly their respective flags, with the cargoes on board, on equal terms in every respect as between each other. * * *

Secretary of State Blaine's instructions to Mr. Lowell:

* * * Nor does the United States seek any exclusive or narrow commercial advantage. It frankly agrees, and will by public proclamation declare at the proper time, in conjunction with the Republic on whose soil the canal may be located, that the same rights and privileges, the same tolls and obligations for the use of the canal, shall apply with absolute impartiality to the merchant marine of every nation on the globe; and equally in time of peace the harmless use of the canal shall be freely granted to the war vessels of other nations. * * *

Lord Granville's reply:

* * * such communication concerned not merely the United States or the American Continent, but, as was recognized by article 6 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, the whole civilized world, and that she would not oppose or decline any discussion for the purpose of securing on a general international basis its universal and unrestricted use; * * *

President Cleveland's message, 1885:

* * * Whatever highway may be constructed across the barrier dividing the two greatest maritime areas of the world must be for the world's benefit—a trust for mankind, to be removed from the chance of domination by any single power, nor become a point of invitation for hostilities or a prize for warlike ambition. * * *

* * * These suggestions may serve to emphasize what I have already said on the score of the necessity of a neutralization of any interoceanic transit; and this can only be accomplished by making the uses of the route open to all nations and subject to the ambitions and warlike necessities of none.

Secretary of State Olney's memorandum, 1896:

* * * That the interoceanic routes there specified should, under the sovereignty of the States traversed by them, be neutral and free to all nations alike. * * *

* * * Under these circumstances, upon every principle which governs the relations to each other, either by nations or of individuals, the United States is completely estopped from denying that the treaty is in full force and vigor.

Message of President Roosevelt in submitting treaty:

* * * It specifically provides that the United States alone shall do the work of building and assume the responsibility of safeguarding the canal, and shall regulate its neutral use by all nations on terms of equality without the guaranty of interference of any outside nation from any quarter. * * *

The very basis for the acquisition by our Government of the Canal Zone, and the acquiescence of the nations in such action, was that it was an act of international eminent domain for the welfare of the world and the equal benefit of the commerce of all nations, and not for our national and selfish purposes.

President Roosevelt's special message, January 4, 1904:

* * * Under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, it was explicitly provided that the United States should control, police, and protect the canal which was to be built, keeping it open for the vessels of all nations on equal terms. The United States thus assumes the position of guarantor of the canal and of its peaceful use by all the world.

Secretary of State Hay's note of January 5, 1904:

* * * The Clayton-Bulwer treaty was conceived to form an obstacle, and the British Government therefore agreed to abrogate it, the United States only promising in return to protect the canal and keep it open on equal terms to all nations, in accordance with our traditional policy. * * *

Lord Salisbury described the Suez Canal "a natural right of passage for the commerce of the world"; and his great rival, Gladstone, added:

We can not undertake to do any act inconsistent with the acknowledgment, indubitable and sacred in our eyes, that the canal has been made for the benefit of all nations at large, and that the rights connected with it are matters of common European interest.

Practically the same doctrine has been the basis of every action of our own Nation relative to the Panama Canal. From the resolution of Henry Clay, in 1837, through every administration it has been uniformly asserted that our interoceanic canal would be one of the great highways of the world, open, free, and neutral to all nations alike.

The report of Senator Davis, of Minnesota, for the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations in 1900, favorably recommending the ratification of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty concerning the Panama Canal, sets forth at length the views of a long line of American statesmen and the reason for the faith within them.

CANAL IS FOR COMMERCE.

This canal is a great commercial enterprise, primarily and properly, and is more liable to be a military liability than an asset in the case of necessity, unless very expensive and extensive military preparations be made to prevent such a contingency. But since the minority does question the right to pass war ships of the United States and Panama through the canal free of tolls, it is well to place the reason for such action of record, so there can be no error about it.

RIGHTS OF OWNERSHIP.

Article 2 of the treaty provides, "and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal." The United States thus has and can enjoy all the rights incident to ownership, which are admittedly to use the canal for its own public purposes and to discharge its own public functions of sovereignty. Among such is clearly the right to use public vessels, its own war vessels, to uphold and promote its own welfare in any manner it deems proper, and be accountable to no one for any such action. That is a conceded and necessary right of ownership.

VESSELS OF WAR AND OWNERSHIP.

But the minority states that vessels of war and commerce of the United States are put on even terms by the provisions of the treaty. It is true that section 1, article 3, does put them on even terms, and if that were all of the treaty, doubtless the minority would be correct. But sections 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6, article 3, must equally be considered with section 1. These provide in substance for the neutralization and defense of the canal, its territory, works, and operations. Article 2 also confers upon the United States the exclusive right of regulation and management. Article 4 prohibits a change of sovereignty of the Canal Zone, affecting the principle of neutralization or obligations of the parties.

CANAL NEUTRALIZED.

It is recognized that the canal, its works and operations, are to be neutralized and not internationalized; that is, it shall be neutral in the sense that it shall not be used as a basis for war by any nation, and that no act of war shall be committed against it by any nation, and that at all times it shall be open on equal terms to all nations observing its rules. These rules, this status, this operation, immunity, sovereignty of the zone, and obligations must be enforced and protected by some competent force against violation. It is agreed by the nations that this shall not be an international burden like the Suez Canal, but confided to the United States alone. It is our duty to defend and enforce it and its privileges. That is conceded.

MEMORANDUM OF SECRETARY HAY.

In his confidential memorandum to the Senate, while the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty was pending, Secretary Hay set forth the views of our Government as to these matters. This memorandum has been discussed at length in those remarks, and need not be here repeated, especially as similar views are contained in the memorandum of Lord Lansdowne, the British foreign minister, from which is quoted the following:

The new treaty, as submitted, declared the neutrality of the canal, for the use of all nations on terms of entire equality; and placed upon the United States alone the burden and responsibility of enforcing such neutrality and the rules and regulations for its management. Under the treaty, as it stands, the United States would have the clear right to close the canal against any hostile nation and to protect and defend it by any necessary means. For these reasons there has been omitted the prohibition against fortification.

In the new draft the United States intimated their readiness "to adopt" somewhat similar rules as the basis of the neutralization of the canal. It would appear to follow that the whole responsibility for upholding these rules, and thereby maintaining the neutrality of the canal would henceforth be assumed by the Government of the United States. The change of form is an important one, but in view of the fact that the whole cost of the construction of the canal is to be borne by that Government, which is also to be charged with such measures that may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder, His Majesty's Government is not likely to object to it.

In view of the permanent character of this treaty, whereby the general principle established by article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer convention is reaffirmed, the high contracting parties hereby declare and agree that the rules laid down in the last preceding article shall, so far as they may be applicable, govern all interoceanic communications across the isthmus which connects North and South America.

As to this, I understand that by the omission of all reference to the matter of defense, the United States Government desires to reserve the power of taking measures to protect the canal, at any time when the United States may be at war, from destruction or damage at the hands of an enemy or enemies. On the other hand, I conclude that, with the above exception there is no intention to derogate from the principle of neutrality laid down by the rules. As to the first of these propositions, I am not prepared to deny that contingencies may arise when not only from a national standpoint of view, but on behalf of the commercial interests of the world, it might be of supreme importance to the United States that they should be free to adopt measures for the defense of the canal at a moment when they were themselves engaged in hostilities.

CONCLUSIONS OF BOTH FOREIGN OFFICES.

These statements of both Secretary of State Hay and the British foreign office, made at the time of the framing of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, contemplated and agreed that the United States should and would be solely responsible for the enforcement of the rules, of neutrality, of the open, free, and equal use, and of sovereignty of the Canal Zone. This naturally and necessarily would require force, and consequently Congress has adopted the policy of fortifying the Canal Zone. Naturally and necessarily such a policy need not be confined to the land forces. Equally must the sea and naval forces be used whenever necessary in the judgment of the United States. For that conclusive reason, it is provided that the ships of war of the United States shall pass through at all times free of charge.

Perhaps the clearest and most forcible statement concerning this situation was made by Secretary Knox in his San Francisco address, as follows:

FOR ALL NATIONS' USE.

Our treaties, in so far as they relate to the canal, contemplate its full and unimpeded pacific use by all nations. The United States, as the occupant and administrator of the territory traversed by the canal, assumes for itself the sole right to see that the canal shall not be misused to defeat that end. Our national policy in this respect is declared by those treaties, wherein we have announced that as a basis for carrying it out the United States adopts substantially the rules for the navigation of the Suez Canal. If any belligerent violates those precepts of the law of nations upon the territory controlled by the neutral State, as the zone is controlled by the United States, the neutral has the right to prevent such violation, just as he would have the right to prevent it on any part of his sovereign territory. That right is an inherent attribute of sovereignty.

NEUTRALITY OF TRANSIT.

The neutrality of transit, which is the particular shade of neutrality intended by the American declarations, can be practically maintained only by the responsible party in possession, and it is the inherent right of the United States to maintain it, precisely as it is to maintain the innocent freedom of transit through any part of its territory. For all purposes of sovereign administration, the canal is American territory and a part of the coast line of our country. It stands to reason that the "neutrality" imported by the generous donation which we make to the world of the impartial privilege of transit and of the use of our own property to that end could not have meant and can not mean that the United States, if at war, would have to abstain from sending warships through the canal or, on the other hand, be constrained to allow the enemy to use it on equal terms with ourselves. The mere statement of such a proposition is its self-reduction to an absurdity.

SAME RIGHTS FOR PANAMA.

Practically the same reason exists as to the war ships and public vessels of Panama, as provided in the treaty with Panama. In addition to maintaining its sovereignty as described in the treaty, Panama also agrees to suitably maintain sanitation and peaceful conditions near the canal, as well as places of refuge for vessels, to be freed from dues by Panama. These obligations are incidental to the general provisions of articles 3 and 4 and should be properly enforced and administered by Panama itself. To enable that Government to properly perform its duties provided by the treaties, and for the evident benefit of commerce of the world, and to save expense and trouble to the United States, and to carry out the provisions of the treaty with Panama, the pending bill provides for free use of the canal by the public vessels of Panama, engaged in such proper public purposes.

Yet such a necessary and concededly proper use of the canal by our public authorities is taken as an argument to violate its rules and our treaties, to reverse our national policies, offend our neighboring nations, imperil our trade, and invite the scorn of honest men because of our greed and perfidy.

XII.

OBJECTIONS OF MINORITY.

DECISIONS OF THE UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT ON THE BRITISH TREATY.

The minority report on page 6 claims that the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the case of Olsen v. Smith (195 U. S., 332) can be construed as a basis for their contention, that by implication the Panama Canal treaty excludes coastwise vessels from its provisions as to equality of tolls. The contrary is the case, and the decision, in fact, sustains the view of the majority as heretofore expressed. The Supreme Court has repeatedly held that in construing treaties of the United States as to political and public questions, that it is bound to follow the construction given to them by the political departments of the Government, whose duty it is to negotiate and prepare such treaties and to administer and enforce them; that is, by the legislative or executive departments. (See J. C. B. Davis's Rules for Construction of Treaties, Rule I; Butler on Treaty Making Power of United States, secs. 391 and 460. Cases cited.)

So, in construing the language in the Panama Canal treaty with reference to a public question, the court would be bound to follow the practical and uniform construction relating to public and political policies already given to similar language in other treaties by the Presidents, departments, and diplomatic officials, and by Congress itself. The policy as to treatment of our whole coastwise commerce, certainly, is such a public question. This is exactly what the court did in the Olsen v. Smith case, cited by the minority.

It should be noted, that since the treaty of 1815, as construed by the Olsen-Smith case, covered only the subject of vessels and required the same treatment as to them, from and to the same port; the Canadians argued and acted as though the treaty of 1871 only covered the subject of vessels, though the language there was "equality of treatment as to citizens, subjects," and so forth.

So, in the controversy above described, the Canadians did treat American vessels identically the same as they did Canadian vessels; and upon this they claimed that they fulfilled the treaty; that it did not mean more and they could discriminate as to all else. Our Government insisted vigorously that the words "equality of treatment," and so forth, was far broader than "vessels" and than the scope of the treaty of 1815; and included traffic, ports, routes, citizens, and subjects, and that all must be treated equally and alike. That contention prevailed, and is now the basis of the construction and action by our Government as to all such language, which is substantially the provision in the canal treaty.

CASE OF OLSEN V. SMITH.

Texas had a statute requiring compulsory pilotage for all vessels entering its ports, but excepting domestic steam vessels in coastwise trade, as provided by section 4444, Revised Statutes United States. The court held, that as to a British vessel coming from a foreign port, such exception did not constitute a violation of the treaty between Great Britain and the United States containing the language "no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any port of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States." The reason for such holding was substantially stated in the opinion, as cited in the minority report; that it is allowable under such language to consider different classes of vessels—those from foreign ports would be one class and domestic steam vessels in coastwise trade would be another class; and that such treaty was not violated because vessels of the class in the foreign trade were included within compulsory pilotage, while domestic steam vessels in coastwise trade might be exempt from it. This is obviously true, because the reasons for the existence of the two classes under the laws as to the compulsory pilotage are entirely different. But that is not all the case presented under the canal treaty.

DIFFERENCE BETWEEN CASES.

The British treaty of 1815 was one of the very oldest entered into by our Government, and by its express terms and its unvarying construction has included only the subject of "vessels" within its scope. But the canal treaty includes not only vessels but citizens and subjects, ports and places, routes and traffic, in both coastwise and foreign trade; as such language in the canal treaty has been construed by the proper authorities of our Government, the legislative and executive departments, in the cases of the Canadian treaty of 1871 and in the Central American treaties concerning commerce and trade across the Isthmus. This construction bears upon the exact language of the treaty under discussion, and the subjects which would be at once affected by the legislation; while the language of the treaty considered in the Olsen-Smith case is entirely different from the canal treaty, and covers only the single subject of vessels.

Further, the Supreme Court in the Olsen-Smith case held substantially that the treaty applied to vessels of the same class and from the same port to the same port; and that when vessels were of another class and from a different port, a different application of the treaty under the peculiar circumstances already indicated by Congress might be made. And this has been the practical construction of such treaties by the executive departments of our Government, for many years past. The Canadian case showed that this obvious defect in such treaties concerning coastwise navigation by including the subject of vessels only, has been corrected in nearly all subsequent treaties. The words "no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in the same port on vessels of the United States" are narrow and obsolete in scope, including only the one subject of vessels; so that much broader language was later used, such as found in the Canadian treaty of 1871, "shall enjoy use on terms of equality with the inhabitants, etc." That has been construed now by agreement of both Governments to include all vessels, ports, traffic, routes, citizens, and subjects; and such construction has been officially adopted by our Government. But the later treaties go much further to insure identical treatment in all respects. The canal treaty provides that "the canal shall be open to vessels of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions on charges of traffic or otherwise." This is certainly broad enough to cover by its terms all phases of commercial intercourse and action.

Practically this same language is contained in the latest British treaty of 1910 concerning the canals of the Great Lakes.

COURT FOLLOWS CONSTRUCTION.

The Supreme Court has always followed the practical construction of the political departments as to provisions dealing with political and public questions, and undoubtedly will so continue, and the exclusion of the coastwise trade of one nation from the provisions of the treaty, and discriminating against such trade of the others, is a public and political question, which must be decided by the political powers of our Government. So that the case cited has no practical bearing upon the question here being considered. Yet it sustains the contention of the majority when understood in its bearing to the other treaties and policy of the United States. The court holds that under such treaty it is allowable to separate the vessels into classes, and that as to some classes compulsory pilotage may be charged; and as to the class of domestic steam vessels in the coastwise trade, that a law of the State exempting them would be sustained.

DECISION FOLLOWS CONGRESS.

That decision practically follows the judgment of the political departments, by which Congress established and the executive departments have enforced such law as to the different classes under such treaty. Several such classes should be considered with reference to this subject.

Under the laws, the compulsory pilotage would apply to all American and foreign steam vessels in foreign trade, coming from the same foreign port to the same port in the United States. It would also apply to all sail vessels in both coastwise and foreign trade. It would also apply equally to all steam vessels of all nations, including the United States, sailing from the same port in the United States to the same port in the United States, unless, under the Federal law, the United States steam vessels should be engaged in coastwise trade and had on board a licensed pilot who must be an American citizen, and was duly licensed as competent under the laws of the United States. In such case only, the American vessel would be exempt from compulsory pilotage. If a British steam vessel should also engage an American citizen as a duly licensed and competent pilot under the laws of the United States, and should proceed in ballast from one port of the United States to another port of the United States where compulsory pilotage is exacted, and then should be compelled to pay such pilotage where an American steam vessel under similar conditions would not, in such case it might be considered whether or not the vessels were treated the same and the treaty be violated. But no such case has been presented, and neither Congress or the courts have considered such a class. And until such case is presented, there can be no basis for the contention of the minority that by implication from such decision all coastwise trade and commerce is excluded from the treaties; and consequently the same construction should obtain as to the Panama treaty. A small, local class might be excluded for a good public reason, which would not violate the purpose or effect of the treaty, while the exclusion of a broader and more general class would so violate the treaty and the purpose of its existence.

A further examination of the treaty, the decision of the court, and the general situation as to commerce and navigation under such treaties, will still further strengthen the contention of the majority.

REASONS FOR CONTENTION.

It will be noted that in the various commercial treaties which the United States has made with other nations as to coastwise navigation and commerce, there are three different classes of arrangements:

(a) Where there is an express reservation of all coastwise trade applying to all articles, and the whole treaty.

(b) Where there is an express reservation of the coastwise trade applying only to one article and one subject and not to the whole treaty.

(c) Where there is no reservation or exception contained in the treaty or in any part of it, and yet Congress has made some exception in its legislation affecting commerce and navigation, in the operation of such treaty.

(Treaties are referred to by Commissioner Chamberlain, vol. 3, Hearings, p. 878.)

It is thus important to examine the conditions, and ascertain the fair and just rule which should prevail as to the action and construction of Congress and our Government, with reference to these three classes of arrangements. It is obvious and must be conceded, that under the first class, where there is a general express exception of the whole of the coastwise trade from the whole treaty, that Congress can do anything it pleases with reference to our coastwise trade. It violates no agreement and nobody can take umbrage at its action, whatever it may be.

NEXT CLASS NOT SO BROAD.

It is also obvious and must be conceded, that when the coastwise reservation relates only to one article or subject of the treaty, that Congress can do as it pleases concerning anything within the scope of such article or subject. As to the rest of the treaty to which the express reservation does not apply, the rule would be the same as to that concerning the third class, where there is no express exception or reservation at all.

RESERVATION NARROWER.

As to the third class, where there is no express exception or reservation; it is obvious that it would not be fair or just to allow such a wide scope or breadth of action, as where there is such an express exception. The exception and reservation implied from a treaty, should by no means equal the scope of the express exceptions on the same subject contained in other treaties. Otherwise, all express exceptions and reservations would be useless and injurious, because in a way limiting the effect. So in all fairness, such exceptions and reservations, by implication from the general terms of a treaty, are necessarily confined to such subjects as do not violate or contravene the express provisions of a treaty and the reasons for its existence; and should be such as may be necessary to promote the general purposes of the treaty.

PURPOSES OF TREATY.

The general purposes of a treaty of commerce and navigation, such as the British treaty of 1815, were to promote commerce and navigation between the two nations, on a basis of justice, equality, and reciprocity. Whatever will accomplish such results and will not violate the express provisions and purposes of the treaty is allowable under it, and can be fairly implied from its terms by either nation.

One of the necessities of commerce and navigation is competent pilotage in strange ports. To insure this, many nations and States have provided for compulsory pilotage, so there should be an assured compensation, adequate to secure and maintain a needed supply of pilots. Under the broad terms of most treaties, this would apply to all vessels alike, unless express exception be made.

RECOGNIZED EXCEPTIONS.

But it is recognized and admitted by everybody, that steam vessels in coastwise trade make many voyages in a year to the various ports between which they ply; and because of the numerous and regular trips and the character of them, are obliged to have pilots on board and attached to the vessel amply competent to do the work. But if such steam vessels in regular coastwise business, with competent pilots on board, were compelled to pay the same compulsory pilotage which others must do who only seldom need them, it would be extremely burdensome, if not ruinous to the business. But the business is a public necessity and should be encouraged and not unjustly burdened or ruined. So that such an exception as to a class of coastwise steam vessels with competent pilots, is necessarily implied in such treaties, for the purpose of promoting commerce and navigation and not violating the express provisions of them. It is just and reciprocal and for the benefit of everybody, and is so recognized by the leading maritime nations. This is the public construction of such treaties, by the political departments of the Government. It is this construction which has been sustained by the Supreme Court in the Olsen-Smith case.

OTHER EXCEPTIONS.

A similar class of exceptions exists with reference to tonnage taxes on vessels. The treaties provide, in substance, that all vessels similarly situated must be treated alike. Congress has so provided substantially, but because of entirely different conditions, and for the purpose of aiding and promoting and not of burdening or stifling commerce, has divided tonnage taxes into several distinct classes, as shown by the navigation laws of the United States.

This does not discriminate against or treat any nation unequally with our own. All vessels within each class are equally treated. Moreover, the classification is just and reasonable and one founded on natural and necessary conditions, which all men recognize. Such a classification in legislation is entirely justified, and will promote the very commerce which it is the purpose of the treaty to do. All nations recognize this fact, and will do this very thing. They are compelled to so do by the exigencies of their affairs. Every little petty difference as to conditions can not and should not be specified in a general treaty. But the general purpose and object of justice, equality, and reciprocity must always be observed. The same rules which we claim and apply to our own vessels, must always be admitted and recognized to apply to other nations. There has never been any difficulty about the classes of legislation which should be excepted from such general provisions. They concerned local and municipal matters of a limited scope, which do not contravene the purpose or effect of the general provisions or purposes of the treaty.

Applying this method of construction to the Olsen-Smith case and to the tonnage statutes, it is evident they do not infringe the general purposes of the treaty, to promote commerce by justice, equality, and reciprocity.

PANAMA TREATY OTHERWISE.

But the exception to the Panama Canal treaty which the minority proposes would clearly operate to the contrary. It would constitute a gross discrimination against vessels, citizens, commerce, places and ports, routes and traffic of our neighboring nations. It would help one competitor and trade over a vast region as against another; it would develop one section of our continent as against another; it would affect, directly or indirectly, a vast number of industries and interests of several nations; it would do the very thing which treaties are framed to avoid and prevent, and which in the end might precipitate a more serious conflict. The maritime Provinces of Canada could complain against a discrimination in favor of their competitors in a similar line of business in the New England States. The Central American States and Mexico could similarly complain against discrimination favoring the competition in which they might be interested adverse to them along the southern boundary of the United States. Especially would the northwestern and western Provinces of Canada complain against a discrimination against them and in favor of their competitors in the Pacific Northwestern States.

These are large matters of international importance and of the very nature which treaties are made to regulate and protect and prevent from more serious contentions. They do not concern local privileges, but a broad national interest.

The exception to be applied by the minority is not a petty local and municipal one, as these others concerning pilotage and tonnage have been. The exception of our coastwise commerce would affect a considerable part of the commerce of many nations, and do the very thing which our statesmen for more than 70 years have solemnly promised should not be done. The implied exception from compulsory pilotage of steam vessels, with native pilots in the coastwise trade, would not affect adversely the interest of any nation, and most of them do exactly as we have done and for the same reason. Because of these facts, the Olsen-Smith case, concerning part of an extremely limited class necessary to promote the purpose of the treaty, does not help the minority; but clearly does sustain the position of the majority of your committee, since it recognizes the rule that a proper construction of any treaty for public purposes must be made by Congress, exactly as was done in the Canadian matter.

CONGRESS HAS CONSTRUED TREATY.

In the clearest and strongest manner Congress has indicated its construction of such language as "Equality of treatment," contained in the Canadian and in the other canal treaties. It has held that the Canadian practice of preferential reductions were a violation of that treaty, and it provided retaliation for such action. While this continues on the statute books, it is submitted that, first, the similar language of the canal treaty must be construed in the way Congress directed as to the Canadian treaty; second, that exclusion by implication of coastwise business can not be made when Congress has so recently and by a law now in force decided to the contrary upon similar conditions; third, that the doctrine of exclusion by implication from the general terms of inclusion can never extend to such a class as the general coastwise commerce of a nation, which would violate the very purposes of the existence of the treaty and every pledge made in its negotiation and ratification.

XIII.

OBJECTION OF MINORITY AGAINST CUSTOMARY POLICY.

The minority vigorously argues that vessels using the canal should not pay for its use with any more reason than the vessels using the Soo Canal and other waterways of the United States should pay for such use, and that the historic policy of this country of free and equal use of its waterways should be so construed as to embrace the Panama Canal. It is true that all of the waterways of the United States are free and open to all vessels and commerce of the world on equal terms, and are free from any tolls against vessels and commerce.

This is done by virtue of treaties, by which the vessels and commerce of other nations receive the same and equal treatment in our waters as our own vessels; and in return our vessels and commerce receive the same and equal treatment in the waters of other nations as their own vessels.

By the act of Congress of 1884 there are no tolls or charges in our waterways against any vessel or commerce, including foreign and domestic, coastwise and oversea.

But no one seriously proposes such a policy of free tolls to everybody in the use of the Panama Canal. Our people do not believe that it would be just to them to expend about $400,000,000 for the construction of the canal, and anywhere from $25,000,000 to $50,000,000 annually in properly caring for it throughout the long future; and then receive no revenue from the commerce so greatly benefited by such vast expenditure. Our public revenues are greatly needed for other public purposes, and no foreign nation seriously asks us to consider such an absurd and extravagant proposition as free tolls to everybody.

Yet if we do not adopt such a policy of treating all nations equally and alike in the granting of free tolls, then we shall radically change our historic policy and treat some nations differently, discriminate in favor of ourselves and against the others, contrary to our expressed pledges as declared in the treaties, and contrary to our historic policy as expressed in our statutes and through our political leaders.

MINORITY URGES RADICAL CHANGE.

The minority urges that this radical change from our historic policy be made. The reason for this is given because it has not been our policy to levy tolls on interstate commerce, and because the Panama Canal is but the extension of our domestic waterway system and of our national coast lines. This general proposition is entirely erroneous for three reasons:

First. Congress has always authorized public improvements which in terms levy a toll on interstate commerce, such as canals, bridges, and so forth. Every session enacts such laws, and they can be found in every volume of our statutes. No one can successfully deny such statement.

Second. The Panama Canal is not an extension of our domestic waterways system, and is not on the same basis as our domestic waterways. On the contrary, nearly every one of the eminent statesmen from the beginning of the enterprise has based his support and the policy of this Nation on the theory that this interoceanic canal is a world enterprise, a highway for the world's commerce, and so forth, and so is on an entirely different basis than any other of our waterways. This has been elaborately discussed in section 6 of these remarks.

The popular use of the term that the Panama Canal is "only an extension of our national coast line" causes confusion in the understanding of the rights and obligations concerning the use of the canal by our own vessels. President Hayes first expressed it as "virtually an extension of our coast line," while Secretary of State Knox, in his address at San Francisco, referred to it as "for all purposes of sovereign administration the canal is American territory and a part of the coast line of our country."

Neither of these responsible officials attempted to place its status as to international obligations the same as that of our own continental coast line or area, as those favoring free tolls seek to do. But if such were really the case, as they contend, then, in escaping from the Scylla of the provision of "entire equality without discrimination," including our coastwise trade under the canal treaty, they would be liable to fly into the Charybdis of the condition set forth by the Commissioner of Navigation in his last report, page 15:

> A long line of treaties point us to equal tolls or no tolls on American and foreign vessels entering the improved harbors of New York, New Orleans, San Francisco, and every other harbor, river, lake, or canal within the United States.

So that if the extreme contention without qualification concerning the extension of our national coast line to Panama be adopted, it might result in infinite perplexities not now realized by those who so jauntily use the term.

Third. The solemn treaties creating international obligations concerning this enterprise require us particularly to treat all other nations equally and alike with ourselves. These treaties differentiate this from all other waterways, and no one can fairly question the application of them and the entire difference between this and the various domestic waterways. This has been fully discussed, and it is not necessary to be here repeated. In his recommendation to the Senate, a short time before the adoption of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, Secretary of State Hay in substance stated there was a consideration on the part of Great Britain for this principle of equality, neutrality, and protection assumed by us, and that is in the yielding of important material interests through the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. That of itself differentiates this from all other waterways under the control of our Government.

But on page 2 of the minority report it argues that—

> Free tolls at the Panama Canal to our coastwise trade would be the same kind of a "subsidy" that was granted to 41,000,000 tons of shipping that passed through the Soo Canal in 1911. It is true that we levy no tolls upon Canadian vessels using the Soo Canal, but that is because American vessels are accorded the same treatment by the Canadian Government at the Welland Canal. By virtue of a reciprocal arrangement we receive our quid pro quo for passing Canadian vessels through the Soo Canal free of charge.

ERRONEOUS STATEMENTS.

This statement and assumption as to the policy as to the Soo and Canadian Canals is entirely erroneous, and it is only necessary to examine the treaties between Great Britain and the United States to perceive such misstatement and fallacy.

Article 27, treaty of 1871, between the United States and Great Britain, contains the language already quoted with reference to the use of such canals.

Article 1 of the treaty proclaimed May 13, 1910, between Great Britain and the United States contained similar terms, quoted hereafter.

It will be perceived that there is no provision or hint of conditional reciprocal use of the American and Canadian canals; that is, that the United States should furnish its described waterways for use of Canada on condition that Canada should furnish its described waterways for use of the United States. On the contrary, it is expressly agreed in the 1871 treaty that they should be used "on terms of equality," and in the 1910 treaty "navigation shall continue free and open and equally to all vessels," and so forth, "rules and regulations shall apply equally alike," and so forth, "and they shall be placed on terms of equality."

This does not provide for conditional reciprocal use of one upon the express condition of the same kind of use for the other, but for use of both on terms of equality, though Congress in its retaliatory statutes, above described, does require that Canada should observe its treaty relations equally and reciprocally with us, or if it does not so do, the United States will not respect the express terms of the treaty and enforce the provisions of reprisal. The term "reciprocal" as used generally with respect to treaties does not carry the same meaning as the term "reciprocal" used by the minority with reference to the treaty arrangements with Great Britain concerning the Canadian waterways. The minority use the word as indicating a mere conditional exchange of physical privileges by which we use Canada's waterways on condition that on the same terms Canada can use our waterways. This is not the proper definition of "reciprocal" as applied to such treaty or most other treaties. As Secretary of State Blaine indicated in his memorandum in reference to the Canadian agreement, reciprocal use as to such treaty would include interpretation and construction of such treaty, the status of the parties, and equality as to conduct. By that it is meant that all the waterways of both parties are to be used by both on exactly the same basis. Equality of use of all is to be reciprocal and not the use of one on account of equal use of the other.

The Panama treaty provides for use "on terms of entire equality, so there shall be no discrimination as to conditions and charges of traffic," and so forth. The provisions and conditions are essentially the same in all of these treaties, and they must be construed by the same rules of fairness and justice, and all require the same result. It should be noted also that the Canadians do not now use our Soo Canal to any extent, since they have a far better one of their own, which we use more than they do. There could not be much reciprocity about such a condition where the Canadians have practically no use for our canal.

The general principles of reciprocity, equality, justice, and fairness underlie all these and other treaties. They were framed to produce such results, and it is the purpose of all civilized people and governments to accomplish these beneficent purposes.

XIV.

WOULD INJURE FOREIGN TRADE.

It has been shown by the statements from the most eminent leaders of our country, who have had the responsibility for the direction of the affairs for an interoceanic canal, that it was primarily designed to promote and protect our trade and commerce. Such has been the hope and expectation of all of our people, who have been glad to expend nearly $400,000,000 in its construction, and who are equally ready to expend as much as may be necessary to operate, maintain, and defend it. But such benefits to our people and to their trade and commerce, very largely will depend upon the policy adopted by us in the management and operation of the canal.

PROMISES TO WORLD.

We have promised the world that this canal would be constructed and maintained for the benefit of the commerce of the world, without any unfair advantage or preference to anybody. We have entered into treaty obligations by which all nations, commerce, people, and ports are to be treated equally and without discrimination; and we, greatest of all of the nations, notified the world that the United States, first of all, intended to observe and be bound by these rules and obligations. Yet now, for the sake of a possible and contingent benefit to a small industry and to a small section and small interest in this country, it is proposed to violate such treaties, obligations, and pledges and discriminate against other nations and in favor of one of our own interests. The nations other than the United States having coastwise or other connections by water between the two oceans are Canada, Mexico, Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, Panama, and Colombia.

COMMERCE OF COASTWISE NATIONS.

These nations have an annual commerce with the United States of more than $700,000,000 annually. We greatly expect, that this will be vastly increased by the opening of the canal. But if we violate our agreements and pledges to these nations—discriminate against them, their citizens, commerce, and trade by means of such violation of the canal treaty—we must naturally expect, deserve, and will justly receive condemnation, reprisals, and retaliation from all of them. They have a direct interest in competition with us, and we promised them equal and just treatment and terms; and now it is asked that we abandon it when some local selfish interest demands it. More than that, such action would incite other rival commercial nations to stir up resentment against us, and to use our own action and our own construction of the treaty as a means indirectly to help our competitors and injure our commerce. This would inevitably follow.

OUR FOREIGN TRADE.

The latest statistical abstract shows that the foreign commerce of the year 1911 was as follows:

Exports	$2,049,320,199
Imports	1,527,226,105
Total	3,576,546,304

And all of this commerce, in some way or other, might be subjected to petty discrimination and disadvantages which foreign nations or their local governments might impose, and which would be without redress under our own construction of the words "equal treatment." Further, it has been estimated that of the exports more than $1,200,000,000 consists of manufactured goods in which our industrial interests are in severe competition with the like interests of rival nations, and that the citizens of this country have investments abroad in foreign countries of more than $2,000,000,000.

DISCRIMINATION EASY.

It is easy to conceive, that if we initiate a policy of reversal of construction of well-known words like "equality of treatment" and insist that domestic concerns can have a preference under such language, and put such a policy in effect upon the Panama Canal; that it will be the beginning of like construction by the nations affected and of a similar policy of retaliation and reprisals against this competitive commerce, and the interests of our own people. We lay ourselves open without redress by just such a contention as this. Such a policy and its legitimate consequences would injuriously affect nearly every industry and hamlet in our land, and cause a disturbance and lack of confidence which should not be underestimated. We seek an extension of our foreign trade, to employ our people and develop our resources. Nothing in the long run would tend more to produce the contrary effect, than to unsettle the confidence in our national good faith and honor among the people and nations of the world. It would be reflected back upon us at once, and our own people and industries and interests would suffer most.

Undoubtedly the Members of this House have all received a copy of the circular letter issued by Mr. Charles M. Everest, president of the Vacuum Oil Co., complaining strongly and justly against unfair discrimination against his company by the Austrian Government, which is clearly violating the terms of its treaty with the United States. The basis of the claim is unequal treatment of the American company as compared with its own citizens.

This complaint would be but a sample and a beginning of what would come from the business interests of this country on account of similar unfair discrimination by other nations.

At the present time our Government has a just basis to demand fair and equal treatment from any Government so violating its treaty agreements, and, if necessary, to make reprisals. But if we ourselves initiated a policy of unfair discrimination, notwithstanding our international pledges, we can not then complain at the same treatment of our citizens by other nations.

OTHER POLICIES AFFECTED.

It is not well for us to forget that, although our great commercial rivals among the nations have in a way assented to our national declaration of policy known as the Monroe doctrine, yet they are not very cordial in their assent. But they do resent the present application of it, that the European nations can do practically nothing in Central and South America without the permission of the authorities in Washington. This is irksome to them, and they would at once take advantage of this opening to prejudice the very nations we seek to help and protect, by calling attention to our breach of faith, our selfishness and greed, and by one means or another imperil our interests and prestige.

SUCH POLICY BASIS FOR HOSTILITY.

This unfortunate policy could be the basis for all sorts of unfortunate complications and misunderstanding; and inevitably result in the loss of sympathy and assistance from those nations with whom we should be on terms of the closest intimacy and mutual benefit, through the operation of the Panama Canal.

If any considerable part of these things should become true, the canal would become a curse to our people instead of the vast blessing which we have so fondly believed might come from it. It would be a strange commentary, that at a time when the United States Government has been sincerely seeking to establish and maintain the most cordial relations of amity and good will, not only with South and Central American Republics but with the other nations of the world; that greedy, private, and sectional interests should even seriously try to overthrow them all, and excite suspicion and ill will and reprisals, which might require years to straighten and allay. It should certainly be realized that such a course would do much to disturb our friendly international relations, and injure foreign trade and prevent the extension of our commerce on the Pacific and elsewhere. No one should minimize the evils of it. The whole country, all of our people and all of their vast and varied interests, are vitally concerned in such a proposition. Whenever the attention of the whole country is directed at such unfortunate possibilities, to assist the greed and narrowness of a few, the chance for evil is usually averted. The majority of your committee has perceived it, and has notified the nations of the world that the obligations and good faith of the United States will be maintained to the letter, so far as lies in our power. We have faith to believe that as they have ever done, our people will preserve their own integrity and self-respect, and deserve the decent respect and good will of all mankind.

XV.

REMISSION OF TOLLS WOULD NOT CORRESPONDINGLY DEVELOP THE AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE.

There are two principal reasons given by the minority of the committee why tolls on coastwise vessels should be remitted. First, to develop and upbuild the merchant marine of the United States and cause the construction of new vessels, which would not be built except for such remission. Second, so that freight rates would be reduced to the consumer. As to the first proposition, the testimony before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce was practically unanimous that free tolls in coastwise business would cause the building of but few, if any, additional ships in the United States. See testimony of Mr. McGregor, president San Francisco Chamber of Commerce, page 997, volume 4, hearings; testimony of Mr. Raymond, manager of steamship lines, page 551, volume 1, hearings; testimony of Mr. George S. Dearborn, president American-Hawaiian Steamship Co., page 567, volume 1, hearings; Mr. D. E. Skinner, president Port Blakely Lumber Co., page 1046, volume 4, hearings. And none of the testimony anywhere has been stronger, than that it would be only one of several important factors toward the upbuilding of our merchant marine.

These were all of the practical business men who appeared before your committee. They are all actually engaged in large business enterprises, and are well acquainted with existing conditions, and nearly all of them appeared before the committee to favor the policy of remission of tolls to our coastwise trade.

REASONS FOR FAILURE.

The reasons for such improbability of development are obvious from the present situation. For nearly a century the coastwise trade of the United States has been confined to American vessels; and the coast-to-coast trade has always been considered a part of the coastwise business. In addition to such monopoly for this class of ships, section 11 of the pending bill prohibits ships owned or controlled by railroads competing in our interstate commerce between the coasts. So that the monopoly to the American vessels is still further restricted by excluding all ships owned by powerful rival interests; thus diminishing the ability of others to compete and the number of ships which can do so; and giving to those who remain in the coastwise shipping business, an advantage equaled by few industries in the world.

LONG AND SHORT HAUL CLAUSE.

Still further and yet even more important, the long and short haul section of the interstate-commmerce act, section 4, has been construed and probably must be construed as prohibiting any more blanket rates between eastern points and the Pacific coast; and the Interstate Commerce Commission in its last annual report has strongly indicated its policy of fixing a different basis of rates for these competing railroads from and to the Pacific coast. See also Opinion No. 1830, filed on the 21st day of March, 1912, in which Commissioner Prouty stated such policies, on page 165; also decisions in the Intermountain Rate cases.

INTERMEDIATE STATES WILL OBJECT.

The intermountain and interior States will very vigorously object to as low railroad rates between the coasts as formerly existed, if done at their expense and to their disadvantage; which will naturally throw much additional business upon the water carriers. This will vastly increase business for the canal beyond the expected and natural increase, which will necessarily come by reason of the opening of the canal, and the decrease of the water rates for transportation, and improvement of facilities.

RATES OF TOLL.

The rates of toll through the canal will be so low as not to be burdensome; and even if remitted would not to any extent increase business or the number of ships. The bill provides for a maximum toll on the basis of $1.25 per net registered ton, and for a minimum toll of the proportional share of operating and maintaining the canal.

The testimony of Dr. Emory R. Johnson, Commissioner Chamberlain, and Col. Eugene T. Wilson all show the net registered ton, to include between a ton and a half to two and a half cargo tons, or, on the average, about one and two-thirds cargo tons would equal a net ton, which it is generally understood will be the basis for tolls at first. The proposed toll of $1 per net registered ton will amount to no more than 40 to 66 cents per cargo ton, or between 2 and 3 cents per hundred on the freight actually carried. It is obvious that this small reduction would not cause the construction of additional vessels for the coastwise trade, and so these practical men testified to your committee.

AMPLE TONNAGE ASSURED.

The testimony of Dr. Johnson and Mr. Dearborn shows the probability of an ample supply of tonnage for the coastwise trade, so that no subsidy or bonus is needed to secure such a supply. (Mr. Dearborn, p. 580, vol. 1, hearings; Dr. Johnson, p. 710, vol. 2, hearings.)

MONOPOLY NOT TO BE SUBSIDIZED.

It certainly would be a strange proceeding now, when the public mind is so aroused against special privileges, for Congress to continue a monopoly of a vast business to a certain class, and in addition to restrict that monopoly further, by excluding from such business all vessels operated or owned by wealthy and powerful rivals. And then yet further, by the interstate-commerce law, prevent the railroads from competing with such vessels as to a very large volume and class of carriage; and then, beyond all, grant a bonus and a subsidy to this favorite and restricted monopoly of $1 per net registered ton, every time it passed through the canal, which has and must cost the people so much of their treasure.

This is an accurate statement, and should bring the blush of shame to those who seek such special privileges for themselves, at the expense of a generous people.

REDUCTIONS TO CONSUMERS.

A similar condition exists as to the reduction of prices to the consumer on account of the remission of coastwise tolls. Mr. Skinner, Mr. McGregor, and Mr. Raymond testified on this point, and the only authentic statement to show a reduction of prices to the consumer, was on page 549, volume 1, hearings, when it was thought that lumber might be sold 25 cents per thousand cheaper in New York on account of free tolls.

The small toll of 2 or 3 cents per 100 pounds would obviously never reach the consumer, and would amount generally to 1 per cent or 2 per cent of the cost of the goods. Some exceptions might reach 5 per cent. But in general the proportion of freight to the cost would be so low as not to appreciably affect the consumer. (Testimony Col. Wilson, p. 126, hearings.) It would be completely absorbed by the transportation or distributing agencies, as stated in the testimony by several witnesses. They do not need this bonus and benefit, since they will be so greatly helped by the opening of the canal and the general reduction of rates on transportation.

BLANKET RATES CAN NOT CONTINUE.

The minority report assumes that freight rates will continue on the same basis as heretofore, after the canal shall be finished. Everyone knows, who will speak sincerely, that this will not be true. The coasts will largely benefit from the necessary reductions. The interior may benefit slightly or not at all. The railroads can not be compelled to reduce rates below the cost of carriage, and the interior points affected by a reduction of railroad rates, will certainly and vigorously object to a severe reduction on through coast rates by the railroads, to be recouped by an advance or a maintenance of local rates when otherwise there should be a reduction.

RAILROADS NOT AFFECTED.

The minority has vigorously raised the cry that imposition of tolls will help the railroads, by maintenance of the coast rates for the transcontinental lines. This is obviously done to conceal their own intentions to violate our treaties and betray the good faith and honor of our Nation; and cover any injury to commerce by reprisals, because of our own national perfidy. It is to be hoped that some benefit may be received by reason of the great reductions, which may ensue because of the opening of the canal. But it is also certain, that such effect will not be caused by the retention or remission of 2 or 3 cents per 100 pounds on freight charges through the canal. It will only be received through the vast increase of commerce, foreign and domestic; and the tremendous development of our country which will be created by means of this additional and cheap communication.

This increase can not be expected by a policy of creating hostility and reprisals among the nations, but rather by the natural and friendly understanding and intercourse which benefits all.

XVI.

COMMERCE PARTICULARLY BENEFITED—SHOULD BEAR ITS SHARE OF BURDEN.

The construction of the Panama Canal is and will ever continue to be a very costly public work to the American people. In the original bill of 1902 a limit of cost of $135,000,000 was provided for. Now the testimony shows that a limit of cost of $400,000,000 is necessary, excluding interest on the investment. It has been necessary that Congress should make annual appropriations, as set forth on page 396, Report of the Isthmian Canal Commission for 1911, as follows:

Including defenses and subsidiary works, the limit of $400,000,000 will be nearly or quite reached in the actual expenditure by future appropriations when the canal shall be opened. The annual cost of caring for the canal, including the interest and defense after it is once in actual operation, will not differ much from the annual appropriations for constructing it, excluding the interest. On page 415, volume 1, Hearings Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, Col. Goethals testified concerning the future cost of operation, maintenance, sanitation, and protection of the canal, that the approximate cost, including interest, would be about $27,000,000 annually.

In his testimony before the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals, Dr. Emory R. Johnson testified, concerning the annual cost of caring for the canal, that it would cost for the same matters about $30,000,000 annually.

ITEMS NOT CONSIDERED.

It will be noted that none of these accounts as to expenses consider two very important and necessary items: First, the cost of naval protection to the canal and its works and the additional naval expenditures consequent upon the canal; second, the additional expense to the military establishment which must in the future be incurred to have ready for duty a fresh and suitable supply of troops, to replace those who suffer from deterioration from tropical service, and the pensions and retirements consequent upon tropical service.

ADEQUATE NAVAL PROTECTION.

Everyone realizes that naval protection is as necessary in the canal as military protection, and it must be at all times adequate or it is useless. There must be a certainty of communication between the continental United States and the Panama Zone within a reasonable time and under all circumstances, or the canal will prove to be an awful military liability instead of a military benefit to the country. No testimony has been taken, and opinions greatly differ as to what naval force will be necessary in the near future to accomplish this purpose. It will doubtless change from time to time, according to conditions. But it is entirely safe to assume that this additional naval expense to the United Stafes will be several millions of dollars each year.

TROPICAL SERVICE FOR SOLDIERS.

It is commonly known also that soldiers suffer from prolonged tropical service and incur disabilities for which they are retired or pensioned; also that they can not remain longer than two or three years in the Tropics without being replaced by new or fresh troops. In order to recuperate they must have a prolonged service in the United States to recover their strength and efficiency.

There will be needed about 8,000 men to garrison and protect the canal. The Army also must have troops in the Philippines, Hawaii, and Alaska which also must be replaced from time to time as shall be necessary.

It would not seem that the present Army is large enough to properly garrison and protect these places, and have a sufficient number of troops in the United States to replace them as may be necessary, and maintain the Army at a proper standard of efficiency. It seems inevitable that additional forces must be supplied some time in the future on account of this increased necessity for tropical service.

INCREASED COST.

No one can now foretell the amount of such increased cost. But competent officials who have devoted much thought to the subject of expense in connection with the Panama Canal, estimate that in the not far distant future, the total expense for the proper operation, maintenance, sanitation, care, and protection of the canal, including interest, naval and military increases, and consequent expenses, will be between $40,000,000 and $50,000,000 per annum. The appropriation bills in the future will not be reduced from the period of construction; and including these other items just described, in the future they will probably be considerably larger, on account of the annual expense of fully caring for the canal.

MILITARY EXPENSES PUBLIC CHARGE.

Everyone admits the propriety and desires to defray all expenses for the national defense from the general Public Treasury. But, as has been shown, this canal was not constructed as a military necessity, but as a general commercial benefaction. The necessary defense for it must be paid by the Public Treasury, the same as all other defensive expenditures are paid. But the commerce which will be so largely benefited, in all fairness, should be willing and glad to pay its share of the benefit it receives directly from this vast and constant expenditure.

Dr. Johnson, in his testimony before your committee, on page 705, volume 2, Hearings, estimated at the beginning about 10,500,000 tons of shipping might use the canal in 1915. Col. De Vol, the chief quartermaster of the canal work, in a very carefully prepared pamphlet, estimated that in 1915 the commerce would be about 7,000,000 tons. Col. Church, an English authority, in a carefully prepared article in the Journal of the Royal Geographic Society, in March, 1902, estimates a much smaller tonnage and increase of business than does Dr. Johnson; as does also the late Joseph Nimmo, former Chief of the Bureau of Statistics.

Dr. Johnson and Mr. Dearborn estimated that there might be a reduction of freight rates of about 25 to 50 per cent.

Joseph N. Teal, Esq., of Portland, Oreg., most competent to speak on the subject of transportation, in a pamphlet sent to the committee, estimated a reduction of 25 to 50 per cent.

EVIDENT REDUCTION.

It is evident, then, that there will be a considerable reduction in freight rates and a saving to the commerce which will pass through the canal and to the people who are directly benefited by such commerce. So it is a natural and a proper question, Why should not this commerce, so largely and directly benefited by such expenditure, bear its proportion of the tremendous annual burden of caring for the canal? Why should it shrink from its fair share of the obligations, evade its duties, and seek to shift them upon the rest of the people, who do not receive such direct benefits from the canal? This share would be but slight and not at all injurious to the commerce affected. Dr. Johnson, in his testimony, shows that it would only be 5 per cent or less of the total freight rate and 10 per cent of the savings effected by the use of the canal. Col. Wilson showed a small ratio of freight to the value of the goods, so the canal dues would be yet a smaller proportion to the benefit received. Surely this is a petty share and contribution, when the rest of the people are compelled to pay so much for all future time for the benefit of this very commerce.

TOLLS NOT BURDENSOME.

No one desires to levy a toll which shall in any way diminish the use of the canal or in any way impair its real benefit to the American people or prevent it aiding tremendously in the development of our western coast. But when the people realize the enormous expenditures which have been and must be made on this account, and the very great benefit which will directly flow to the commerce which will use it, it does seem, in all fairness, that such commerce should do its fair share.

XVII.

UNFAIRNESS OF FREE TOLLS IN COASTWISE TRADE.

Everyone must concede, as a fundamental proposition, that it is no part of the function of the General Government to directly and purposely discriminate in favor of one part of the country as against other parts of the country; to directly subsidize the business of one part of the country so that it can compete thereby on unequal and more advantageous terms with the other parts of the country. On the contrary, it has always been and is regarded as the business of the Government to prevent and forbid unfair discrimination and treatment between different sections of our common country.

This principle is set forth in several clauses of the Constitution, and is made effective in numerous statutes. The general purpose and function of our Government is clear, to prevent discrimination, and prevent sectional inequalities and injustices, so far as possible.

COASTWISE BUSINESS.

Dr. Johnson estimated that the coastwise business by water between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts would be about 1,150,000 tons annually; and that there would probably pass through the canal in 1915, 10,500,000 tons. The Interstate Commerce Commission, in its opinion in the intermountain rate cases, estimated the coast-to-coast commerce at about 4,000,000 tons annually. The commission further estimated that of this vast commerce at least 93 per cent was capable of water carriage, thus leaving 7 per cent which must be transported exclusively by rail. It has been further estimated that of the competitive products used in intermediate country, fully 75 per cent probably came from the territory of the Central West, between the Allegheny and the Rocky Mountain States; and about 25 per cent was produced along the Atlantic seaboard. This has resulted from substantially the following conditions: That the cost of production of the various articles is about the same in all of this vast competitive region; and that if the cost of distribution and transportation should also be practically the same, then the competition would be on substantially even basis from the different sections of the country to the intermountain and coast territory. This has been the result of years of friction and discussion, and is at present the situation as to most products.

LONG-AND-SHORT-HAUL CLAUSE.

But the amendment to the long-and-short-haul clause—section 4—of the Mann-Elkins bill of 1910, and its enforcement as to the intermountain territory and elsewhere in the cases recently decided by the Interstate Commerce Commission, will completely change this situation, long before the canal will open for real business.

The policy of that law is to prohibit higher rates for a shorter than for the longer haul, and this principle will be obliged to be enforced by the Interstate Commerce Commission in some form or other. (Report of Interstate Commerce Commission for 1911. See decisions Commissioners Prouty and Lane in the intermountain rate case and opinion of Commissioner Prouty, Mar. 21, 1912, No. 1830, p. 165, already cited.)

SUCH SITUATION RECOGNIZED.

Everyone must recognize such fact and situation. When that shall be done, the railroads will not make reductions to the coasts on the noncompetitive business. It would not be just or necessary. On the competitive business from eastern points the commission has indicated that its policy will be, first of all, to abolish the blanket system of coast rates from the eastern and central sections of the country; next, that it will permit the railroads to meet water competition between the coasts within certain limitations, by establishing zones of territory where the railroads may charge a percentage of 25 per cent, 15 per cent, or 7 per cent, respectively, less to the Pacific coast than to the intermountain country. The power of the commission to do this, in this way, is assailed, and the question as to such authority is now before the Supreme Court. But if the commission can not accomplish this result in this particular way, it certainly will by another method; and, if necessary, undoubtedly Congress would extend its present powers, because there is a substantial justice in its main conclusion.

REDUCTION BY WATER COMPETITION.

These reductions of railroad rates to the coast as compared to the intermountain territory, are solely on account of existing water competition. The commission, from the zone substantially east of the Alleghenies, authorizes a reduction of 25 per cent for the coast rates from those to the intermountain territory, of 15 per cent for the coast rates from the zone next west, mainly to Chicago, and 7 per cent from the zone next west, substantially to the Missouri River, excluding the St. Paul and Omaha territory. That is its best judgment as to the effect of existing water competition concerning the territory within such zones. The remainder of the country must have equal rates to the mountains and coast; or, in other words, such territory is not affected by water competition on the ocean. That is the best judgment of the Interstate Commerce Commission as to the policy and justice of public action under existing conditions; and in that way it is expected that a part, at least, of the present system of competition will be preserved.

EFFECT OF OPERATION OF CANAL.

But when the Panama Canal shall be finished and in operation, as we have already considered and as the commission has stated in its reports, it may be fairly expected that rates from coast to coast on the 93 per cent of competitive products which can be carried by water, will be still further reduced from 25 per cent to 50 per cent.

REDUCTION WILL CHANGE RATES.

This will greatly change the absolute rates, and still more the relative and competitive rates between the various competitive sections and interests. If the estimation of the Interstate Commerce Commission be approximately correct as to the value and effect of existing water competition upon the traffic of the different territorial zones, then the proportions of present advantage to the sections would be 25 per cent to the eastern, 15 per cent to the next, 7 per cent to the next, and nothing to the westernmost competitive zone.

EFFECT OF CANAL.

If now the Panama Canal shall increase the value and effect of water competition from 25 per cent to 50 per cent by reducing water rates by such a proportion, as is admitted, then the same proportion would increase to the eastern zone from 25 per cent now to about 31 to 38 per cent; of the next zone from 15 per cent now to about 18¾ per cent to 22½ per cent; and of the next zone from 7 per cent now to 8¾ per cent to 10½ per cent; and the next zone not at all. It is very probable that the great increase of facilities and number of competitors will much further increase these differences between the different sections of the country. This clearly gives the eastern competitors a very great and increasing advantage over those from the Central States to reach the rich and increasing trade of the Pacific coast and the intermountain country. But the minority on this point argues that the western railroads will be obliged to also reduce their competitive rates to equally care for their competitive business.

RAILROADS CAN NOT REDUCE.

A little reflection will show that this can not possibly be done as to a very large volume of competitive business. First of all, the commission would not allow such reduction, as such policy would be grossly discriminating against the intermediate territory, which would not be just or fair. The intermediate people would bitterly complain, as they have in the past, and such gross discrimination could not be permitted to exist against them. Next, the railroads could not stand such reductions in their revenues to meet the water rates to the coasts and at the same time maintain only reasonable intermediate and local rates. The expenses of operating of railroads is necessarily increasing, and that can not be avoided. The public demands safety in transportation, and that requires vast expenditures for competent labor, equipment, facilities, and so forth, merely to be safe. The public will demand adequate facilities which must be increased in the very near future, and that will also require vast expenditures, which can only be met by means of ample revenues. These can not be realized if the railroads reduce their rates proportionally to the reduction caused by the canal. The wages paid to railroad employees can not possibly be reduced, and more than likely must be from time to time increased. That is just and proper and must be expected. The public and the railroad managements are beginning to prepare for such necessary conditions.

COMPETITIVE RATES NOT MUCH REDUCED.

The railroads will not be permitted to reduce their competitive coast rates so as to be out of fair proportion to their intermediate and the intermountain rates, and recoup by raising or maintaining local or intermediate rates which would otherwise be reduced. In other words, the competitive coast rates, because of new water competition on account of the Panama Canal must and should not be reduced at the expense of the rest of the country. If the revenues warrant, reductions ought to be made. But with an increased wage to labor, increased facilities at enormous cost and increased taxes exacted by public authorities; it is not reasonable to expect such reductions. Under this situation, it is evident that a much larger proportion than at present of the 93 per cent, the competitive proportion possible to be carried either by rail or water, will then be transported through the canal; and of course the Atlantic coast territory, as the producers, will get the benefit of such reduction of rates and consequent increase of business. This will necessarily much reduce the proportion of the competitive products now forwarded by and sold to the Pacific coast from the Central West; and proportionally increase that portion now produced and sold from the Atlantic coast. That is to be expected and nobody can complain, as such will be the direct and necessary result from the opening of the Panama Canal.

CONDITIONS EXTEND COAST TRADE.

This changed condition will also extend eastward the trade territory of the Pacific coast cities, and to the same extent diminish the trade territory of the cities of the Central West. These cities in this vast and productive region can not meet the greatly lowered water rates through the canal on many products now furnished to the coast, and the railroads will not and can not place them upon the existing competitive equality. No one can foretell the extent of the loss of territory and trade of the central western cities or of the corresponding gain of the coast cities. But such a condition is to be fairly expected and no one can fairly complain.

REAL COMPLAINT.

Now comes the real and just complaint. All of this territory, east and west, north and south, pays its fair proportion of the enormous expense of construction and annual operation and maintenance of this canal. The eastern and western sections receive very large and direct benefits at once, which, we trust, will be tremendously increased. The central sections are but slightly benefited and some not at all. Is it not fair, then, that the commerce itself, which is so largely benefited and the benefits so unequally distributed should pay its fair share of the annual burden of maintenance and operation? If it does not so pay its fair share, and free tolls be allowed on the coastwise trade; the only effect would be to enable the eastern producer to lay his goods on the coast from 2 to 3 cents per hundred cheaper in consequence of such free tolls, and by that means to place his central western competitors under this additional handicap. Then it would also enable the Pacific coast competitors to push their trade territory just a little farther eastward, so far as the 2 or 3 cents per hundred of free tolls would permit them. This additional territory so gained by them, would be taken from the existing trade territory of the Central West; solely by reason of this reduction of rates on account of free tolls. It would thus directly operate to discriminate and subsidize the coast producers and merchants, as against the Central West producers and merchants. This would be the sole and main effect.

The lumber producers on the Puget Sound claim that they should have this advantage to meet the cheaper freights of the Canadian competitive territory. The customs tariff was levied to meet that exact situation, and these gentlemen want a protective tariff and free tolls both, even though our treaties prevent. Properly their argument would lead rather to free ships than free tolls, and they then would be placed upon an equality as to expense of transportation.

NO RAILROAD QUESTION.

The railroad question and welfare has nothing to do with this matter. The railroads will live and do business anyway. They will earn their revenues anyway. If they do not in one way, they will in another. The real loss of trade will not seriously affect them, as they can recoup in other directions. But it is entirely different with the industries in the Central West. If their competitive territory be seriously reduced, if their business be permanently lost, there can be no such redress, and to that extent it will interfere with the prosperity and advancement of that vast and patriotic section of the country.

EFFECT FROM TOLLS.

This section is entirely willing to pay its fair share of all public expenses in and about the canal, and it expects to see its competitors legitimately profit and advance by them. But it is unwilling to have such competing commerce exempted from its fair share of the public burdens, and especially from the burden conferring such direct and enormous benefits upon it, especially when such exemption and favoritism will unfairly reduce their trade and diminish their territory to that extent, more than is naturally or properly necessary. Free tolls would be but taking their own money to use in strangling and injuring their own business. It is taking the public money from the Central West, to use in dwarfing its development and impairing its legitimate advancement and influence.

NOT UNDERSTOOD.

It is difficult to believe that the business interests of the coasts realize this gross unfairness and injustice. It is difficult to conceive that the business man of any section of the country will deliberately plan to extort public funds from a competing section of the country and then use such funds to subsidize and extend their own private business and proportionally injure that of their competitors. This has not been tried before in this country and should not be sought now. We want the business interests of the coasts to receive their legitimate and tremendous advantages which will accrue them by reason of the construction of the Panama Canal. But it does seem to be the grossest injustice to continue to tax the Central West for all time, to build up and advance their already greatly favored rivals of the coasts, at the expense of competing territory which has generously and patriotically done its full share for the benefit of the whole country.

XVIII.

CONSEQUENCES OF VIOLATING TREATY RELATIONS AND PLEDGES.

On the 22d day of February, 1902, through a proclamation of the President of the United States, so authorized by the Constitution to do, the United States solemnly pledged itself that "such treaty and every article and clause thereof may be observed and fulfilled with good faith by this United States and the citizens thereof." What should properly be included in such obligation and pledge has been discussed. But it is now important to realize and summarize briefly some of the unfortunate consequences which would ensue, if the United States deliberately violated such solemn agreements. First, it would change and unsettle the construction of most of the existing treaties of commerce and navigation of the United States with other nations of the world. In most of them are employed the words "terms of equality," "equal terms," "like terms," and so forth; and the construction of such language has uniformly been that the provisions to which such "equal terms," and so forth, applied, must operate identically the same upon the two contracting parties. By the plan of the minority it is proposed to change such uniform and sensible construction of the words "terms of entire equality," and so forth, "so that there shall be no discrimination," and so forth; and hereafter by such words imply an exception of our own domestic commerce. If that be conceded, then fairly must the same be also conceded to the other contracting parties, and the treaties now in force would have an entirely different effect than at present.

WATERWAYS AFFECTED.

There are important straits connecting oceans or seas used by international commerce where the United States has insisted upon the application of the general principles of neutrality and equality; among them may be noted the Strait of Canso and the Strait of Magellan. Both of these are very important to our commerce, and it has always been the policy of our Government to insist upon equality of treatment and neutrality in their use. The treaties with the various nations practically provide for such use. The Panama Canal does not stand on entirely the same basis, because constructed at the expense of this country. But our Government has solemnly pledged its use on practically the same basis of that of these straits. If such general principle be violated by us in the use of the Panama Canal, it may be fairly expected that similar occasions may arise in the future, where the nations of Great Britain, controlling the Strait of Canso, and Chile, controlling the Strait of Magellan, if they shall be denied equal treatment and find their commerce discriminated against by our Government in the use of our great international highway at Panama, may also in same way give our commerce a dose of our own treatment in the use of their international waterways.

SOO CANAL.

For example, the largest and most important part of water traffic of this country is upon the Great Lakes, where last year there passed through the Soo Canal 62,363,218 tons, valued at $654,010,844, as shown by the last report of the Chief of Engineers, page 892. There passed through the American Canal, in 1911, 12,544 vessels, carrying 23,624,553 short tons of freight and 36,021 passengers; and through the Canadian Canal 6,854 vessels, carrying 32,804,286 short tons of freight and 33,670 passengers. Freight money paid for the year was $38,710,904. Of this freight carried 94 per cent was in American vessels and 6 per cent in Canadian vessels. The average number of vessels passing through the locks per day were as follows:

Through Poe Lock (depth of water in lock, 18.5)	38
Through Weitzel Lock (depth of water in lock, 12.9)	25
Through Canadian Lock (depth of water in lock, 19)	32

These figures show conclusively that the Canadian and the foreign business through these locks is of slight consequence, but that the bulk of it is the coastwise commerce of the United States. The Canadian vessels carried only 6 per cent of the total traffic, while the Canadian Lock passed 32,804,206 short tons and 33,670 passengers, as against 23,625,553 short tons and 36,821 passengers, for both American locks.

AMERICAN VESSELS USED CANADIAN LOCK.

It is evident that the large American vessels used the Canadian Lock to a very great extent. This is unquestioned, and the reasons are that frequently conditions of navigation make it more convenient and even important to so do; and still more important, the Canadian Lock has a depth of 19 feet, while the Poe Lock has 18.5 feet. The Canadian Lock has 6 inches more water, and each inch will transport on the average about 100 additional tons of freight; and by this the earning capacity of each freighter so using such depth could be increased from $75 to $100 for each trip, or double such sum for the round trip, and for a season would amount for each vessel between $2,500 to $3,000. (S. Doc. 105, 62d Cong., 1st sess., p. 15.)

VALUE OF CANADIAN CANALS TO THE UNITED STATES.

Last season 6,854 vessels passed the Canadian lock, and it is probable that at least two-thirds of them were American. So that the value of such use in additional freightage caused by the added depth alone would amount to fully $10,000,000 for the season.

On the Welland Canal the latest Canadian statistics show that the quantity of freight annually passed in American vessels from United States ports to United States ports has varied from a minimum of about 300,000 tons to a maximum of 775,000 tons; and that last year the Welland Canal passed in Canadian vessels 921,321 tons and American vessels 774,108 tons.

These figures show the importance of both waterways to the domestic commerce of the United States, far exceeding the importance of the Panama Canal concerning domestic trade.

TREATY PROVISIONS APPLIED.

There has already been discussed the provisions of each treaty; and if the United States insists on the policy and right to discriminate in its favor through the Panama Canal, equally under similar language in the Canadian treaty, can Canada discriminate in favor of its coastwise trade and against our coastwise trade on the canals of the Great Lakes? Canada did vigorously contend for just such a construction as the minority advocates, and undoubtedly would welcome it now. But it must be realized that such a construction and discrimination would affect many millions of people and hundreds of millions of traffic annually; and in the very region where the opening of the Panama Canal will admittedly discriminate against it as compared with its competitors.

WEST NEEDS CANADIAN CANALS.

The Central West needs the free and equal use of the Canadian canals and the St. Lawrence River, and must have them for its development and welfare. The existing conditions are satisfactory and conducive to prosperity. But such a change as advocated by the minority might precipitate a conflict which would be disastrous in the extreme, and injure still further the great section already yielding by the canal more than its share to its competitors on the coasts. The Canadian commerce upon the Great Lakes no longer has use for our Soo Canals, and need no longer fear the reprisals of our statutes providing for discrimination in case Canada refuses to agree to our construction of the treaties relative to the canals. If Canada shall see fit to adopt, in reference to its Soo and Welland Canals, the exact construction the minority contends for the use of the Panama Canal, our commerce would be nearly helpless. Canada could use its own Soo Canal and would not mind any discrimination in the use of our Soo Canals. If we discriminated in the use of the St. Clair Channels, Canada could retaliate in the use of the St. Lawrence River. This but illustrates the dangers of such a policy sought by the minority.

It is submitted that such possibilities for evils to large sections of our country should not be precipitated by selfish interests, and they are passing the limits in their greed to help some petty special benefits.

POLICIES ENCOURAGE TROUBLE.

Such a condition would be likely to extend over the whole domain of our diplomatic relations in our use of foreign and international waterways. A deliberate breach of international good faith as to this most important treaty, would subject this Nation to suspicion everywhere—at home and abroad—of unreliability and perfidy. No nation could deal with us on the assurance that our most solemn agreements would be respected in case selfish private and local interests could persuade to the contrary. No one could safely trust our national agreements, in the fear that greedy and influential interests might at any time compel a violation of them. Such an example would impair the moral character of our own people and subject our public action in domestic and international matters to the severest test of corrupt pressure. The time to stop this greed and narrowness and consequent injury to our people and our Nation, is at its inception.

REPUTATION INJURED.

Such a reputation, lack of respect, and unreliability would injure our foreign relations of all sorts, and foreign nations would discriminate against us whenever possible. No one can overestimate the benefit of the highest credit and character in the world's affairs. Throwing it away now, as sought by the minority, would cost our people beyond measure and require years to recover, after its realization.

The domestic commerce itself would suffer also. The conditions of "equality and neutrality" are the basis of international agreements. When equality is not agreed to, then must "neutrality and fair dealing" cease also. If our coastwise trade be not subject to such rules of equality and neutrality; no one could foretell the evil consequences which might ensue in case of war, which might involve the Canal Zone. No nation would sympathize with its plight; and all the world would be glad to see it suffer; since it, by its own selfishness, would not be protected by the rules of the canal treaty and by the rules of neutrality.

REQUIRE LARGER MILITARY FORCE.

Such a condition of discrimination and dissatisfaction would require an enlarged armament and still more expensive military and naval preparations; to properly protect the coastwise commerce, from which the rules of neutrality are withdrawn and against which there would be constant and just discrimination and resentment. No one can foretell the difficulties to us, but we would begin to realize the benefit of preserving inviolate our faith and honor, and maintaining in all fairness and justice this international agreement and our pledges solemnly undertaken.

TRUE POLICY.

The true policy of Congress and our Government should be to treat every nation, all trade, every vessel, and citizen with the same fairness and equality. This will insure the largest use of the canal, the most agreeable sentiment toward it in the world's commerce. The majority of the committee has endeavored to do this and that commerce shall not be burdened in any way by it. Under these conditions we are confident that with the good opinion of the world, the natural and tremendous increase of our foreign and domestic commerce and development, will compensate our people for their vast expenditures.

The triumphs of the decade of construction are a just pride of a sensitive and mighty people, but this brightness will fade and these glories resolve to ashes, unless a similar constructive genius and an unswerving integrity shall compel these labors and sacrifices to contribute to the Nation's honor and prosperity. Our people must cast aside their prejudices and local self-interest, realize to the full their broad responsibilities and obligations, and appreciate the breadth and magnitude of the tasks and problems which confront them; if they do then, as in the past, we can face the future with confidence, that the most gigantic work of the ages will add its full share to the welfare and fame of our common country.

Treaties and acts of Congress relating to the Isthmian Canal.

Convention as to ship canal connecting Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, 1850. (Clayton-Bulwer treaty.) Concluded April 19, 1850; ratification advised by the Senate May 22, 1850; ratified by the President May 23, 1850; ratifications exchanged July 4, 1850; proclaimed July 5, 1850. (Treaties and Conventions, 1889, p. 440.)

ARTICLES.

I. Declarations as to control of canal, occupation of territory, and commercial advantages.
II. Neutrality of canal in case of war.
III. Protection of construction.
IV. Mutual influence to facilitate construction.
V. Guarantee of neutrality.
VI. Cooperation of other States.
VII. Mutual encouragement to speedy construction.
VIII. Protection to other communications.
IX. Ratification.

The United States of America and Her Britannic Majesty, being desirous of consolidating the relations of amity which so happily subsist between them, by setting forth and fixing in a convention their views and intentions with reference to any means of communication by ship canal which may be constructed between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by the way of the River San Juan de Nicaragua and either or both of the lakes of Nicaragua or Managua to any port or place on the Pacific Ocean, the President of the United States has conferred full powers on John M. Clayton, Secretary of State of the United States; and Her Britannic Majesty on the Right Hon. Sir Henry Lytton Bulwer, a member of Her Majesty's Most Honorable Privy Council, knight commander of the Most Honorable Order of the Bath, and envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of Her Brittanic Majesty to the United States, for the aforesaid purpose; and the said plenipotentiaries having exchanged their full powers, which were found to be in proper form, have agreed to the following articles:

ARTICLE I.

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain hereby declare that neither the one nor the other will ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over the said ship canal; agreeing that neither will ever erect or maintain any fortifications commanding the same, or in the vicinity thereof, or occupy or fortify or colonize or assume or exercise any dominion over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito Coast, or any part of Central America; nor will either make use of any protection which either affords or may afford, or any alliance which either has or may have, to or with any State or people for the purpose of erecting or maintaining any such fortifications or of occupying, fortifying, or colonizing Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito Coast, or any part of Central America, or of assuming or exercising dominion over the same; nor will the United States or Great Britain take advantage of any intimacy or use any alliance, connection, or influence that either may possess with any State or Government through whose territory the said canal may pass for the purpose of acquiring or holding, directly or indirectly, for the citizens or subjects of the one, any rights or advantages in regard to commerce or navigation through the said canal which shall not be offered on the same terms to the citizens or subjects of the other.

ARTICLE II.

Vessels of the United States or Great Britain traversing the said canal shall, in case of war between the contracting parties, be exempted from blockade, detention, or capture by either of the belligerents; and this provision shall extend to such a distance from the two ends of the said canal as may hereafter be found expedient to establish.

ARTICLE III.

In order to secure the construction of the said canal, the contracting parties engage that if any such canal shall be undertaken upon fair and equitable terms by any parties having the authority of the local Government or Governments through whose territory the same may pass, then the persons employed in making the said canal, and their property used, or to be used, for that object shall be protected, from the commencement of the said canal to its completion, by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain from unjust detention, confiscation, seizure, or any violence whatsoever.

ARTICLE IV.

The contracting parties will use whatever influence they respectively exercise with any State, States, or Governments possessing, or claiming to possess, any jurisdiction or right over the territory which the said canal shall traverse, or which shall be near the waters applicable thereto, in order to induce such States or Governments to facilitate the construction of the said canal by every means in their power; and, furthermore, the United States and Great Britain agree to use their good offices, wherever or however it may be most expedient, in order to procure the establishment of two free ports, one at each end of the said canal.

ARTICLE V.

The contracting parties further engage that when the said canal shall have been completed they will protect it from interruption, seizure, or unjust confiscation, and that they will guarantee the neutrality thereof, so that the said canal may forever be open and free and the capital invested therein secure. Nevertheless, the Governments of the United States and Great Britain, in according their protection to the construction of the said canal and guaranteeing its neutrality and security when completed, always understand that this protection and guaranty are granted conditionally and may be withdrawn by both Governments or either Government if both Governments or either Government should deem that the persons or company undertaking or managing the same adopt or establish such regulations concerning the traffic thereupon as are contrary to the spirit and intention of this convention, either by making unfair discriminations in favor of the commerce of one of the contracting parties over the commerce of the other, or by imposing oppressive exactions or unreasonable tolls upon passengers, vessels, goods, wares, merchandise, or other articles. Neither party, however, shall withdraw the aforesaid protection and guaranty without first giving six months' notice to the other.

ARTICLE VI.

The contracting parties in this convention engage to invite every State with which both or either have friendly intercourse to enter into stipulations with them similar to those which they have entered into with each other, to the end that all other States may share in the honor and advantage of having contributed to a work of such general interest and importance as the canal herein contemplated. And the contracting parties likewise agree that each shall enter into treaty stipulations with such of the Central American States as they may deem advisable for the purpose of more effectually carrying out the great design of this convention, namely, that of constructing and maintaining the said canal as a ship communication between the two oceans for the benefit of mankind, on equal terms to all, and of protecting the same; and they also agree that the good offices of either shall be employed, when requested by the other, in aiding and assisting the negotiation of such treaty stipulations; and should any differences arise as to right or property over the territory through which the said canal shall pass, between the States or Governments of Central America, and such differences should in any way impede or obstruct the execution of the said canal, the Governments of the United States and Great Britain will use their good offices to settle such differences in the manner best suited to promote the interests of the said canal and to strengthen the bonds of friendship and alliance which exist between the contracting parties.

ARTICLE VII.

It being desirable that no time should be unnecessarily lost in commencing and constructing the said canal, the Governments of the United States and Great Britain determine to give their support and encouragement to such persons or company as may first offer to commence the same, with the necessary capital, the consent of the local authorities, and on such principles as accord with the spirit and intention of this convention; and if any persons or company should already have, with any State through which the proposed ship canal may pass, a contract for the construction of such a canal as that specified in this convention, to the stipulations of which contract neither of the contracting parties in this convention have any just cause to object, and the said persons or company shall moreover have made preparations and expended time, money, and trouble on the faith of such contract, it is hereby agreed that such persons or company shall have a priority of claim over every other person, persons, or company to the protection of the Governments of the United States and Great Britain, and be allowed a year, from the date of the exchange of the ratifications of this convention for concluding their arrangements, and presenting evidence of sufficient capital subscribed to accomplish the contemplated undertaking, it being understood that if, at the expiration of the aforesaid period, such persons or company be not able to commence and carry out the proposed enterprise, then the Governments of the United States and Great Britain shall be free to afford their protection to any other persons or company that shall be prepared to commence and proceed with the construction of the canal in question.

ARTICLE VIII.

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain, having not only desired in entering into this convention to accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a general principle, they hereby agree to extend their protection, by treaty stipulations, to any other practicable communications, whether by canal or railway, across the isthmus which connects North and South America, and especially to the interoceanic communications, should the same prove to be practicable, whether by canal or railway, which are now proposed to be established by the way of Tehuantepec or Panama. In granting, however, their joint protection to any such canals or railways as are by this article specified, it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of, as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford.

ARTICLE IX.

The ratifications of this convention shall be exchanged at Washington, within six months from this day, or sooner if possible.

In faith whereof, we, the respective plenipotentiaries, have signed this convention and have hereunto affixed our seals.

Done at Washington, the 19th day of April, A. D. 1850.

Treaty between the United States and Great Britain to facilitate the construction of a ship canal. Signed at Washington, November 18, 1901; ratification advised by the Senate, December 16, 1901; ratified by the President, December 26, 1901; ratified by Great Britain, January 20, 1902; ratifications exchanged at Washington, February 21, 1902; proclaimed, February 22, 1902.

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas a convention between the United States of America and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in Article VIII of that convention, was concluded and signed by their respective plenipotentiaries at the city of Washington on the 18th day of November, 1901, the original of which convention is word for word as follows:

The United States of America and His Majesty Edward the Seventh, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, and Emperor of India, being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in Article VIII of that convention, have for that purpose appointed as their plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States, John Hay, Secretary of State of the United States of America;

And His Majesty Edward the Seventh, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, and Emperor of India, the Right Hon. Lord Pauncefote, G. C. B., G. C. M. G., His Majesty's ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the United States;

Who, having communicated to each other their full powers which were found to be in due and proper form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE I.

The high contracting parties agree that the present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention of the 19th April, 1850.

ARTICLE II.

It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

ARTICLE III.

The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal, that is to say:

1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary; and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service.

Prizes shall be in all respects subject to the same rules as vessels of war of the belligerents.

4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal, except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal, within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case, shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

6. The plant, establishments, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be part thereof, for the purposes of this treaty, and in time of war, as in time of peace, shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents, and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal.

ARTICLE IV.

It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of the international relations of the country or countries traversed by the beforementioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

ARTICLE V.

The present treaty shall be ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by His Britannic Majesty; and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington or at London at the earliest possible time within six months from the date hereof.

In faith whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed this treaty and thereunto affixed their seals.

Done in duplicate at Washington, the 18th day of November, A. D. 1901.

JOHN HAY. [SEAL.]
PAUNCEFOTE. [SEAL.]

And whereas the said convention has been duly ratified on both parts, and the ratification of the two Governments were exchanged in the city of Washington on the 21st day of February, 1902;

Now, therefore, be it known that I, Theodore Roosevelt, President of the United States of America, have caused the said convention to be made public, to the end that the same and every article and clause thereof may be observed and fulfilled with good faith by the United States and the citizens thereof.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, this 22d day of February, A. D. 1902, and of the Independence of the United States the one hundred and twenty-sixth.

[SEAL.] THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

By the President:
JOHN HAY,
Secretary of State.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to be notified at the end of 30 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, in addressing this committee this afternoon as briefly as I can, I shall confine myself to the subject of the treaty rights of our own and the other nations concerning the canal; but, before discussing that subject, I wish to say just this about what has been said by the preceding and other speakers in favor of free tolls, concerning the help to the transcontinental railroads, that provision in the bill would be. I desire to say that all the testimony is before the House; every word of it. Nobody appeared before the committee against the proposition of free tolls among those interested, though our traffic expert, Dr. Johnson, and Col. Goethals, chief engineer of the canal, so testified. The only witnesses who appeared before the committee, interested in the subject, were those in favor of free tolls. So this committee will realize that if there were any one class of men in this House who have not desired under any circumstances to help any railroad or any special interests through the operation of the Panama Canal it would be the majority members, as to this bill on both sides of the aisle, of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The chairman, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON], the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN], the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN], the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SMITH], the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH], the gentleman from Maine [Mr. GOULD], the gentlman from Ohio [Mr. GOEKE], the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH], the gentleman from New York [Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL], the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN], and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON], I have only to name them to the Members of this House to give this House the full assurance that those men have guarded and will guard the interests of the people to the utmost limit, and would allow nothing to be contained in the bill for the purpose of helping the interests of the transcontinental or any other lines or any other special interests. I think it only justice to them to have some statement like this placed in the RECORD. [Applause.] The majority of the committee believe that the reasons why we should not have free tolls are national and not local. With the exception of the very excellent address of the gentleman from Michigan, who takes a broad international standpoint, the other addresses have been simply local and designed to help special local interests on the Pacific coast, and that has been their standpoint in considering this matter. I wish to address this committee on the important questions from the broad national standpoint as worthy of the greatest engineering triumphs of the ages. The reason why we did not have free tolls are in substance these: First, because such a policy would clearly and plainly violate the solemn pledges of our Government and our international good faith.

Second. Such a policy would improperly and greatly injure the interests of our country among the other nations of the world, would greatly injure and impair our foreign trade, and injure our investments and interests in other countries.

Third. The policy of free tolls in the coastwise trade would not add one single vessel to the American merchant marine, as testified before our committee and which is contained in the testimony, and it would not make any appreciable difference to the consumers of the country, and so would not subserve any public purpose for our people.

Fourth. The enormous expense of operating that canal is little realized. Col. Goethals testified that the annual expense, including interest, would be between $27,000,000 and $28,000,000. Dr. Johnston testified before the Senate committee that the expense would be about $30,000,000 per annum. Other eminent authorities have testified, taking into consideration all the different phases of the expense caused by the canal, that the annual expense, including interest, would be between $40,000,000 and $50,000,000 per annum. Everyone realizes there would be a very great reduction of freight rates—anywhere from 25 to even 60 or 70 per cent. Why, in all fairness, should not this commerce, so greatly benefited by that reduction of freight rates, pay its share of the enormous burden, maintained throughout all time, of $40,000,000 or $50,000,000 per year upon the American people?

Fifth. These gentlemen, in discussing the economic features, all assume that the present system of blanket freight rates from the East to the coast will continue. The Interstate Commerce Commission in not less than three recent cases and in their last report have clearly indicated that their policy in the future would be to gradually abolish the blanket rates and establish a system of zone rates or something of that sort. If that be true, the present system by which the Central West competes with the coast would be abolished, because the coast rates, on account of water competition, would be lower than the interior rates, as they ought to be when the canal shall be finished. And when that shall be done it will benefit the coast producers and the merchants very much more than it can possibly benefit the interior merchants and producers. That benefit is just, and ought to be expected; but why, in addition, should the merchants and producers of the Pacific coast ask—in addition to these tremendous benefits which they are bound to receive from tolls, so that they can discriminate still further against the producers and merchants of the Central West—to take additional trade territory away from them? That is not natural, fair, or just. And yet that is practically the only effect of free tolls—to subsidize the coast interests at the expense of the interior.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield to a short question at that point? I was wondering whether this bill made any regulation for the making of rates by water by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No; it does not.

I am about to discuss the subject of treaties, but I am just outlining in a general way why we should not have free tolls.

Now, six. The language of this treaty concerning the Panama Canal is almost identical in language with other treaties concerning not only the canals upon the Great Lakes, but other international waterways in which we are interested; and if the policy be adopted of providing by an implication—remember, by an implication—that our coastwise trade can be excluded, that same construction can be fairly allowed to other treaties concerning other national waterways. Consider the national waterways of the Great Lakes. The Canadian Soo last year passed 32,000,000 tons, three-fourths of it American tonnage. The Welland Canal last year passed 775,000 of American tonnage—all of this American trade. Now, if we discriminate against Great Britain under this treaty as to their coastwise trade, under similar language Canada and Great Britain can discriminate against us upon the coastwise trade of the Great Lakes, very much more important than the trade which can go through the Panama Canal. Now, those are in brief——

Mr. DOREMUS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I will.

Mr. DOREMUS. I merely wanted to ask the gentleman if he recalls the last time Canada attempted a thing of that kind.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I will show that to the gentleman very clearly after a little.

Mr. DOREMUS. I wish he would explain that.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I will before I get through. I do not think the gentleman will be exactly satisfied with the situation, but I will be glad to do it.

That is the outline of the reasons why we ought not to have free tolls. In discussing the provisions of the treaty—and that is what I shall address myself to this afternoon—it is well to understand what the treaty is. The main proposition in this controversy is the treaty between Great Britain and the United States, made in 1901, and known as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which covers the Panama Canal. The Panama treaty contains the same, in substance, and discussion of the English treaty will cover the whole subject. The contention is concerning the provisions of article 3, containing six different sections. The first section of such article is the main section in dispute, and I will read the substance of it, so that the committee can have it clearly in mind.

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations—

No qualification or exception—of all nations observing these rules—

Notice that—on terms of entire equality—

Notice that—no qualification or exception—

so there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its subjects or its citizens in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise.

In other words, the language of that section is just as plain as can be that the charges as to all vessels, of all nations, their citizens, their subjects, shall be on terms of entire equality, without any discrimination against anybody.

Clearly that covers every nation observing these rules. It covers all kinds of trade observing these rules. The language is plain.

But these gentlemen insist that there must be something else implied from that. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] insisted that the words "other nations" do not include the United States at all; that it excludes both coastwise and foreign trade. As I gather from the minority report, they only imply that the coastwise trade shall be excluded. They deduce that by implication, so that whatever basis they rest upon must be by implication from the plain terms of the treaty. There must be an exclusion of such coastwise trade by implication. It certainly is not directly provided.

There is nothing in the treaty itself that allows free tolls. It must be an exception implied by the general conditions of the treaty, and that is the only possible way.

Now I shall discuss that phase of the subject and, first, the intrepretation of the treaty itself. Article 1 provides that the canal may be constructed in either one of three different ways: First, by the United States itself directly, at its own cost; or, second, by a gift or loan of money—that, I presume, is by a guaranty of bonds to individuals or corporations—and, third, by subscription to or purchase of stocks or shares, such as has been done by some nations as to Suez Canal.

There are three different ways by which the canal itself can be constructed. Now, I doubt if any of these gentlemen have the hardihood to assume that if the canal were to be constructed by a private corporation, as the Suez Canal was constructed, there would be any implication in this treaty by which that private corporation would be obliged to give free tolls to private vessels. I doubt if anyone would have the hardihood to assume that. And yet the language of the treaty and the rules and regulations of the treaty are identical concerning the three different methods of construction. The United States by this treaty is created as a corporation solely for the purpose of constructing and operating that canal, with identically the same provisions, the same responsibilities, and the same rights as though that canal had been constructed by a private corporation.

Now, this treaty and all its provisions are based on the Suez conditions. The Suez Canal was constructed by a private corporation, just exactly as this might have been constructed by a private corporation. The language of the Suez treaty, I say, is almost identical with this one in many respects; and this provision is based on the Suez rules, and nobody can contend that the Suez Canal can be compelled or allowed to give a preference to any vessel of any nation. On the contrary, there is an express prohibition against it, with one exception. Section 12 of the convention concerning the Suez Canal provides that the rights of Turkey, as the territorial owner, are expressly excepted. There is an express exception for Turkey, whereas there is no express exception in this case for the United States. So that it is clear that if any express exception had been desired for our own vessels, based on the analogy of the Suez Canal, it ought to have been stated. But it was not stated, and in all fairness, under any rules of construction, no express exception should be implied.

Now, second, article 3 is the main article in this treaty. It regulates the operation of the canal, the method of tolls, and the method of neutralization, and the last five sections regulate the method of neutralization. It will be noted that the two subjects belong together—equality of tolls and treatment and neutralization.

The two things are integrally connected. They are connected necessarily, for the reason that if any nation has a preference, and if any nation is at a disadvantage on account of that preference, such a nation which is at the disadvantage necessarily would not be willing to concede that neutrality should exist to the nation that is favored. Necessarily that is so all over the world in every treaty which has been made, that equality should coexist with neutrality, and the two are always placed together. I will insert in the RECORD very many cases and the remarks of very many of our statesmen and publicists to the point that neutrality and equality are inseparable.

Now, if by implication you exclude the coastwise trade from the provision as to equality, you necessarily exclude it from the exception as to neutrality. You do that necessarily, because they belong together, and that is clearly stated in the report of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, which reported the original Hay-Pauncefote treaty, in which Senator Davis, probably one of the great international lawyers of his day and generation, covered that point in a short clause, which is found on page 12 of the Senate report on the Hay-Pauncefote treaty:

> In conditions that may not be entirely remote we should find this provision, in letting our ships through the canal free from capture by our enemy, of great security to our coastwise trade.

And the same matter is discussed by Prof. John Bassett Moore, probably the most eminent of our publicists, in holding that if an exception be made as to equality, that exception must also be made as to neutrality. And yet the very essence of the existence of the treaty is that there must be both equality and neutrality.

Again, there has been discussion of the language of the preamble to this treaty and its connection. Now, everybody knows what a preamble is for. It is mainly for two purposes: First, to show the reason for the existence of the instrument and why it was made effective; and, next, to show how it should be construed, to make effective the reasons for its existence. Those are the two things that a preamble is for.

This preamble provides, in substance, that this treaty is made without impairing the general principles of neutralization established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. Now, what does article 8 provide as the general principle? It provides three things: First, that there should be equality between the vessels of Great Britain and the United States—equality as to all vessels, not coastwise merely, but equality as to every kind of vessel; second, that there should be neutrality; and, third, joint protection. But gentlemen say it might be inferred that the word "equality" in this article 8 is so broad that coastwise vessels might be excepted, the same as it is desired to except them from the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. It is fortunate that that very word has been construed by the action of our own Government.

In 1895 Secretary of State Olney, of the last Cleveland administration, in his memorandum concerning the construction of these words, as to what constitutes "general principle," stated that these terms can be best understood by examining the previous seven sections of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and ascertaining the reasons for its existence and the meaning of the terms and how they should be applied.

Now, the chairman of the committee [Mr. ADAMSON] yesterday read into the RECORD three different provisions of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, in article 1, article 5, and article 6. I will place them in the RECORD; but they provide, in substance, that the making of this treaty and the existence of this canal shall be to secure the utmost equality—perfect equality, I think, is the term used—of the ships of all nations, and especially of Great Britain and the United States; and the language is expressly used, so that the ships of neither one, neither the United States nor Great Britain, shall be placed at a disadvantage or particular advantage on account of the existence of the canal. In other words, the making of the canal shall not operate in any possible way to place our ships at an advantage of Great Britain or the ships of Great Britain at an advantage of the United States.

Mr. LEWIS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. LEWIS. I want to inquire whether the Suez Canal was subject to the same treaty attachments and obligations that are spoken of now with reference to the Panama Canal?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Practically, and the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is based upon the Suez treaty, with practically the same obligation.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. We exclude all countries from our coastwise trade?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. It is not proposed to open it to any country?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Not that I know of. I hope not.

Mr. CANNON. How is it possible that this treaty should cover the coastwise trade so far as the tolls are concerned? It is free of cost on our seashore through our possession of the Panama Canal, and how can it be claimed, even granting, for the sake of the argument, that the gentleman's construction is not a strained one as to the foreign commerce—how can it be held that, as we monopolize our coastwise trade, Great Britain would be able to complain, by any construction of the treaty, that we could not relieve that coastwise trade from tolls?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I should be glad to answer the gentleman, but I would like to do it in my own way by continuing as to the construction of the treaty itself.

Mr. CLINE. Will the gentleman yield for a question right in that line?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CLINE. According to the rule of implication, if we purpose to relieve our own coastwise trade, is it not fair to include in it the other party to this contract, and also include the coastwise trade of Canada?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; and I will discuss that at some length in a few moments. Now, gentlemen, the point I am trying to make is that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty provided clearly that the vessels of Great Britain should be treated just the same as the vessels of the United States, both coastwise and foreign; that that is the general principle which is provided, and that is shown in the preamble. In other words, the words "general principle" in the preamble required that there should be entire equality of treatment of all vessels, all traffic, and all trade, and in a few minutes I will show that that has been the construction put upon it by the United States itself as to the coastwise trade as applied to these words, and that is why I asked the gentleman from Illinois to wait for an answer to his question.

The United States itself has construed these identical words in the canal treaty and that in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty as requiring that the coastwise trade should be included in its terms and can not be excepted. I think that will answer the gentleman when I show him what the Congress and our Government has done.

But one thing more as to the making of the treaty.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Is it not true that England rebates the tolls collected from her vessels?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; and that is entirely valid under these treaties. We could do the same thing.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I do not agree with the concession the gentleman from Minnesota has just made, that England rebates the tolls collected at the Suez Canal.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Perhaps I made my statement a little too broad. The gentleman from Michigan asked if it is not lawful under the treaty to have that done.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. No; I beg the gentleman's pardon; the gentleman from Michigan asked the gentleman from Minnesota if England did not rebate the tolls through the Suez Canal on her vessels.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Well, that is immaterial to this discussion.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I shall undertake to show, when I get time, that England does not rebate the Suez Canal tolls.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Now, Mr. Chairman, a few words concerning the origin of the treaty and what was intended to be accomplished by the treaty. The treaty was initiated in 1898 by Secretary Hay himself, after the war with Spain had been finished. It was initiated by letters to the American Embassy in London, asking the American Embassy there to ascertain from the British foreign office upon what basis a new treaty could be made to supplant the existing Clayton-Bulwer treaty. The British foreign office made its statements, and they are on the files of the State Department and open for inspection by anybody who wishes to see them. The British foreign office stated clearly three things: First, that the British vessels of all kinds must be treated on even terms with our vessels of all kinds. There is no qualification or exception about it. It was a fair proposition. Second, there must be perfect equality; and, third, that the charges must be fair, just, and equitable.

Secretary Hay at once replied that these conditions were fair because they were a part of the historic policy of this country for more than 50 years—that the treatment must be identical among the vessels of all kinds, coastwise and foreign. Now, Secretary Hay stated that and the British foreign office agreed to that.

Mr. MADDEN. Was the word "coastwise" used?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. It was used in a memorandum to us by Secretary White in the State Department. The treaty was framed in accordance with these provisions embracing this language. After I describe the conditions on the Great Lakes the gentleman will see why this language appears.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Was this pending the negotiation of the treaty, this construction of it, or after it was negotiated?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. It was pending the negotiation—before it was negotiated.

Mr. CANNON. Then it was a mere part of the sparring back and forth.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No; but they agreed to it.

Mr. CANNON. Is it in the terms of the treaty that they agreed to it?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Using the word "coastwise"?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No; that is not necessary, as the gentleman will see in a few minutes as we proceed.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. CULLOP. After that was done, when the treaty came before the Senate for ratification, it was then and there so construed, was it not?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. CULLOP. And an amendment was offered not to include the coastwise trade, and was voted down by a vote of 23 to 46.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad that the gentleman from Indiana has recalled that to my mind. On page 16 of Senate Document No. 85 Senator Bard, of California, offered an amendment that coastwise business should be excluded. That was voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will inform the gentleman from Minnesota that he has now consumed 30 minutes of time.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I shall take 10 minutes more, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman whether the memorandum to which he refers in the State Department was submitted to the Senate with the documents that were submitted?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. It was submitted in a memorandum of Secretary Hay himself.

Mr. CANNON. In that same connection, will the gentleman also explain, touching the language to which he refers, if it is not true that the talk about the coastwise trade in the negotiations referred to the coastwise trade of Canada through the canal and not the coastwise trade of the United States?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Not at all. The only memorandum that exists in the State Department is a memorandum attached to the letter of Henry White, the chargé at London, and that memorandum states the view of the British foreign office, that there must be, as I think they say, perfect equality of all vessels.

Mr. MANN. Was that memorandum submitted to the Senate?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Secretary Hay submitted a lengthy memorandum of his own to the Senate, a very lengthy memorandum. The files of the State Department, of course, were not sent up there, but the memorandum contained the views I have just stated.

Mr. MANN. And that memorandum is printed?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. MANN. What I wish to inquire is whether the gentleman was calling attention to some secret information in the State Department which was not submitted to the Senate.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No; it is a matter of public record, and is noted in Moore's International Law. That is how I found it.

Mr. MANN. I think it was not submitted to the Senate. It was not before the Senate.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I do not suppose those identical papers were.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to contribute unnecessarily to the consumption of the gentleman's time, but before he gets away from his colloquy with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] I wish to call his attention right in this connection to the well-established rule, supported by unbroken precedent, and he can publicly challenge it now, forever, everywhere, that whenever a treaty is formed and no express mention is made therein of a distinction between coastwise and foreign trade there is no difference in the treatment, and every time an exception is made a reason exists and is shown for it.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The gentleman is entirely right, as I will show clearly.

To follow the suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana, Judge CULLOP, the conclusive reason under ordinary circumstances, when an amendment exempting coastwise trade is offered to a general provision which would include the coastwise trade, is that the Senate evidently did intend to retain the coastwise trade within the general provisions of the treaty. That is the natural use and construction of such language. The minority met that by a private letter from the late Senator Bard, of California, in which he stated that of course the Senate understood that the terms of the treaty might imply that coastwise trade be excepted just the same as fortifications. As to that there is only this to say: Senator Bard's amendment was offered in terms to article 3 of the treaty.

Article 3 provides, in substance, that the United States shall invite other nations to adhere to the terms of the treaty, and therefore Senator Bard offered an amendment to an article of the treaty which was not germane and of no consequence at all, and only a page before of this very pamphlet it shows that article 3 had been already stricken out on a motion of Senator Foraker, and that Senator Bard knew nothing about it. So Senator Bard's statement was known in the Senate or believed in the Senate that the implication excepted coastwise trade. It can be realized, the value of such a statement, since he did not know that there was not any such article in the treaty to which he offered the amendment. Further than that, there are 13 Senators in the Senate now who voted against it. Senator Frye from Maine and Senator LODGE offered bills as to Panama Canal tolls directly the contrary to the views expressed by Senator Bard, but in accordance with the views of the gentleman from Michigan, that the treaty does not allow inequality or discrimination; that the treaty does not allow discrimination in tolls; if we desired to help our coastwise trade it must be done by a direct appropriation from the Treasury. Now, those bills are a part of the files of this Congress and I will insert them in my remarks.

Mr. KNOWLAND. If the gentleman will permit me, I will read out of my own time from a letter of Senator Bard to me. In this letter which I have from Senator Bard he says:

I find I have omitted to say that when my amendment was under consideration it was generally conceded—

And he underscores the words "it was generally conceded"—

by Senators that even without that specific provision the rules of the treaty would not prevent our Government from treating the canal as part of our coast line, and consequently could not be construed as a restriction of our interstate commerce forbidding the discrimination for charges for tolls in favor of our coastwise trade, and this conviction contributed to the defeat of the amendment.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I say that Senator Bard knew nothing about it, as is evidenced by a man who offers an amendment to a section that is not in existence. The fact that the most eminent Members of the Senate who voted on the subject entirely disagreed with Senator Bard, who did not believe it was proper to give them free toll, and two of them have introduced bills; and one bill is now pending in the Senate, based on the fact that the treaty did not allow a discrimination as to coastwise trade.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Does my colleague think that Senator LODGE does not believe that we can do this?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I say Senator LODGE has a bill pending in the Senate, based on the same proposition advanced by the gentleman from Michigan, that in order to help our coastwise trade we can not do it by free tolls, but it must be done by direct appropriations from the Treasury, and I will insert that bill in my remarks.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Senator LODGE authorized a gentleman in this city to telegraph to the railroad commission of California that he believed that could be done.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I will place in the RECORD the matter and the gentleman can judge just as he pleases. His official record is to the contrary, and if the gentleman's information concerning Senator Bard is about as reliable as that concerning Senator LODGE I hardly think that a great international work can be based upon that sort of information.

Mr. KNOWLAND. The gentleman does not question the reliability of this letter?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Oh, no.

Mr. ALEXANDER. If I understood the contention of the gentleman, we can not discriminate in favor of American shipping or the coastwise over foreign trade.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. That is my contention.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I take it you concede this Government may, out of the Treasury, appropriate money to pay the tolls of American ships going through the canal.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Oh, yes; I think there is no doubt about it.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Would not that be a violation of the treaty to do that, but if we can do that indirectly, in other words, in the first instance, if we charge ships going through the canal a certain toll and then we reimburse them out of the National Treasury, is not that a violation of the treaty and can not we do that directly that you concede we can do indirectly?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Well, I am very glad to answer that, because the same thing is done at Suez, and the reason for it is this: The treaty provides that all nations, our own and others, must be placed on a basis of equality; that is, when we pass through the canal we are to be all treated just exactly alike. Now, each nation determines for itself when it reaches that canal as to its own policy of helping its ships through there based on an equality so far as going through the canal is concerned, but if our Nation insists on giving free tolls to its own ships on the canal, it then places itself on an inequality, and treats itself then differently from the way other nations are treated.

So that the very moment we place ourselves on a different class than the other ships of other nations, we place ourselves in a different situation from other nations. We treat them and their ships upon inequality, and the treaty requires equality, and that can only be done by allowing each nation to decide for itself what it shall do for its own shipping at the entrance of the canal. That is the doctrine of the regulation at Suez and that is the doctrine as to this canal.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman then explain why subsequent to the two treaties with Great Britain a treaty was entered into with the Government of Panama by which free tolls were allowed to vessels belonging to that Government?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I will get to that. But now I want to say a word as to the fortifications.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman take that up?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I will be very glad to do so and follow it next.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Ten minutes more, Mr. Chairman.

There was a prohibition against fortifications in the original treaty and then a sort of contradictory amendment in the Senate allowing defenses in a sort of way. And when these provisions were stricken out both Secretary Hay and Lord Lansdowne, the British foreign minister, sent memoranda, and in both of them it was stated that the language of the treaty as it now stands allowed fortifications, and the burden was upon the United States itself to defend that canal, its neutrality, and guarantee its protection in its own way. I will place those views in the RECORD.

But if the burden is upon the United States to use its land and naval forces to protect the canal, to protect its neutrality, and to protect its rights, it can use in the management of the canal those public vessels belonging to the Government which may be necessary to be used for canal purposes, as set forth in the treaty. And for that reason the United States has a right to send its war vessels through the canal, and the same right and necessity exists for sending the vessels of the Republic of Panama through the canal, for the purpose of making effective the purposes of the treaty.

Now, article 4 of the treaty provides that the sovereignty of the zone, the change of sovereignty, shall not affect the rights under the treaty. So the burden is upon the United States to see that article 4 is enforced, that the sovereignty of the zone is protected, and the rights under the sovereignty are protected. In order to do that and carry it into effect we provide that Panama shall protect its own sovereignty, subject to the general protection of the United States. In our treaty with Panama we stated then, "You do your own policing, you provide your sanitation, provide harbors of refuge for all vessels free of expense, and the vessels and forces necessary to protect such things," and for that purpose we let the public vessels of Panama which are required by that treaty through the canal free of expense.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is only a question of whether we could make that exception in our own behalf.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. We do. We let our own public vessels, owned and used by the Government for public purposes, not private vessels, with nothing to do with commerce and trade and nothing to do but to protect the sovereignty of the canal, go through free of toll.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield? In the treaty the vessels of commerce and of war are in the same sentence and connected together, are they not, in which it says "vessels of commerce and of war"?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. How can you let war vessels through free and not let commercial vessels through, when exactly the same language is used in the treaty as to both?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. For this reason: The words "public vessels" in the bill, including Government vessels, are for the purpose of defending the canal and its neutralization. In the treaty those words refer to those vessels not necessary to protect the canal. Lord Lansdowne and Secretary Hay agreed clearly upon this point, that under the treaty the United States clearly had the right to use its own forces, including war vessels, to protect the sovereignty of the United States and of the zone and to regulate the management of the canal, to preserve neutralization, and all those things. It is as necessary for us to use our own war vessels for protection and defense, just the same as we use our own public vessels for carrying out the purposes of the canal management under the treaty.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the agreement as to the Suez Canal allow vessels of commerce belonging to Turkey to pass through on more favorable terms?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. It makes an exception as to the territorial sovereign. Turkey can do as it pleases under such an express exception.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then, Turkey is not on all fours——

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. It is. If we desired an express exception, we should have said so at the time. We did not say so at the time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In other words, we have lost our chance?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The gentleman has stated the matter accurately. We have lost our chance. Now, one thing more——

Mr. FORDNEY. Would not it be right that you should have the privilege to rebate tolls to the American ships?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I did not say that. I say we have no right to pass them through free and pay them afterwards. We have the right to rebate them under just such a bill as has been introduced by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY].

Mr. FORDNEY. Then, conceding that again, would we not have the right to have American vessels enter into an agreement with this Government that their ships shall be used as auxiliaries to our Army and Navy, and for that consideration receive a rebate of the tolls?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Well, Mr. Chairman, the language of the bill is very direct. It says "public vessels of the United States." Whatever shall be necessary for the protection of the canal, for the protection of the sovereignty of the United States and of Panama, as applied to the canal, undoubtedly could go through free. But that is for the executive departments or the canal authorities under the bill to decide.

Now, one thing further. These gentleman have very generally argued that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was wholly superseded, and that there was no contract, no reason, no consideration for the existence of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and that we got the worst of the bargain, and that there is nothing in it for us to enforce, so far as coastwise trade is concerned.

Let me call the attention of the committee to this: When Secretary Hay was obliged to negotiate for this treaty he was confronted with this situation: Under the existing treaty, as all our administrations had admitted, Great Britain had certain rights, territorial rights, shadowy in a way, but she had rights of joint protection and control of any interoceanic canal. It was absolutely necessary, the United States and most of our statesmen believed, to get rid of those rights. Now, Great Britain, on the other hand, said: "We will give you the sole right to build the canal and run it in your own way, provided you take equally as good care of our commerce as you do of your own," so that when we came to make the bargain, we said: "You yield the right of joint protection over the canal, and any shadowy right you may have in Central America, and we in our turn will yield our preferential rights in behalf of our own commerce and place yours and ours on the same basis."

The words of the treaty carry out exactly that bargain. Now, let me read the final result of the action of the United States. When President Roosevelt submitted the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to the Senate he stated in his message that this treaty did not impair the general principle of neutralization which I have described. When he finally promulgated the treaty he stated in his proclamation of promulgation that this treaty did not impair the right, under general principles of neutralization of treating all nations alike under these treaties, and then he added these significant words:

> Now, therefore, be it known that I, Theodore Roosevelt, President of the United States, have caused the said convention to be made public, to the end that the same and every article and clause thereof, may be observed and fulfilled with good faith by the United States and the citizens thereof.

In the exact language of the treaty itself the President of the United States bound us solemnly and morally, as a Nation and as a people, to observe every article and clause of that treaty and all the terms thereof. So that our own Government, our own officials, our own history, the very reason for the existence of the treaty itself, compel us to treat all vessels of trade, either coastwise or foreign, alike.

Mr. WILDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts for a question.

Mr. WILDER. Is there anything in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty or in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty that lets England in any way into our coastwise trade?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No, sir.

Mr. WILDER. Then, manifestly unequal things are not equal, and if England can not get into our coastwise trade under any circumstances, how can England be put upon a par or equality with our own coastwise trade? She is not in it at all, and if she is not in it at all, how can there be any discrimination against her where she is not involved?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I will tell the gentleman. The treaty was made to cover just this point: England desired that her commerce should not be placed at a disadvantage with our commerce; she desired that her citizens should not be placed at a disadvantage with our citizens, on account of the construction of the canal. Now, the citizens of the Maritime Provinces have in many ways competing business with the citizens of New England. The people of Mexico and Central America have competing business with the citizens of our Middle West and the southern Gulf States, and the citizens of the British Provinces on the Pacific coast have competing interests with our citizens on the Pacific coast.

Especially the people of the northwest Pacific coast of the United States have competing business interests with the Canadian Pacific coast. Now that treaty was framed for the purpose of allowing all British vessels and British business interests and British citizens to have exactly the same rights through that canal and at the canal that similar interests of our own people have had. In other words, that in the use of the canal their competing trade should not be placed at a disadvantage with our competing trade, and that was the very reason why Great Britain consented to that treaty and yielded its own rights so that that should be done, and we agreed that it should be done.

Mr. WILDER. Quite right; but the line of demarcation clearly is where we come in competition with British vessels.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The gentleman is entirely wrong, and if he will allow me and will be patient I will reach that point and show him that our Government itself has decided that exact contention directly to the contrary. I will come to that right now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed 50 minutes.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, 10 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 10 minutes more.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. In 1871 the United States concluded at Washington a treaty with Great Britain concerning the use of the canals on the Great Lakes. Article 27 of that treaty reads as follows:

> Her British Majesty engages to urge upon the Government of the Dominion of Canada to secure to the citizens of the United States the use of the Welland, St. Lawrence, and other canals in the Dominion on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion.

Now, let me read the canal treaty. Remember the Canadian treaty provides the use of the Canadian canals "on terms of equality." The canal treaty provides:

> All nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so there shall be no discrimination.

Under that British treaty concerning the Canadian canals a very serious dispute arose in 1888. Canada insisted that the words "terms of equality" did not include its coastwise trade, because the coastwise trade of Canada is confined to Canadian interests, just the same as the coastwise trade of the United States is confined to United States vessels. Accordingly the Canadian Government framed rules in council providing for the export of grain; that the tolls on the Welland Canal should be 20 cents a ton; that if the grain that went through that canal was exported from Montreal or east of it a rebate of 18 cents per ton should be allowed on such exports; and then provided later that if that grain was transshipped in Canada the 18 cents should be allowed, but that if it were transshipped in the United States the rebate would not be allowed, but that the whole 20 cents must be paid. At that time there was a great competition beween the Canadian ports on Lake Ontario and the American ports on Lake Ontario as to such transshipment, and the American business interests along all of the Great Lakes, at Duluth, Chicago, Detroit, Buffalo, and Cleveland, all passed resolutions, just as similar ones have passed resolutions now, only they took the opposite position then from what they take now. At that time the Chamber of Commerce of Detroit stated:

> We believe that it was the intent of the twenty-seventh article of the treaty of Washington to secure to both American and Canadian vessels and citizens equal advantages in the use of the Welland Canal, the same as is granted to all vessels passing through the St. Clair Flats and Falls of St. Mary.

In other words, these chambers of commerce then took the position that the Canadians had no right to discriminate in favor of their local business, in favor of their local vessels, in favor of their coastwise business and of their own citizens under the words of the treaty "equality of treatment."

The Lake Carriers' Association, probably then and now the largest association of vessel owners in the United States, took very strong opposition to the action of the Canadian Government, and submitted many memorials to the Cleveland administration. President Cleveland investigated the matter very carefully through Secretary Bayard, and sent a message to Congress, in which he insisted that we did not get equal rights with Canadian vessels, because our ports, our trade, our traffic, and our citizens were being discriminated against, because the action of Canada violated the words "on terms of equality." The Canadian Government did nothing, but continued its discriminations, as described.

The matter continued into the administration of President Harrison. President Harrison in due time transmitted two messages to Congress, in which he took the same position as did President Cleveland, that the words "equality of treatment" covered everything—vessels, citizens, ports, routes, traffic, everything. The Canadian Government stated that the words "equality of treatment" only covered vessels. The negotiations went along until 1892, when President Harrison sent a final message to Congress, which I have here, setting forth all of these facts.

There were two bills introduced in Congress, one in the House and one in the Senate. In the House it was introduced by the Representative from Georgia, Mr. Blount, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and in the Senate by Mr. Davis, of Minnesota. In the meantime the House Committee on Rivers and Harbors had passed a resolution denouncing the discrimination and demanding the facts, and Secretary Blaine set forth these facts in a reply to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, in which he said that Canada was guilty of obvious discrimination under the treaty. The House Committee on Foreign Affairs in a report stated, in substance, the facts that I have stated to you, and finally concluded its report with the strongest language, denouncing the unfairness and perfidy of the Canadian Government.

Remember that Canada was, as stated by a committee of this House, making identically the same contention that is now made by the minority, that the coastwise trade of Canada was not included within the words "treatment of equality."

When the bill came before the House Judge Blount, of Georgia, discussed the bill elaborately, and I will put some of his remarks in the RECORD. These will be found on page 6531, volume 126, of the RECORD of 1892. He stated in substance that the treaty forbade Canada to discriminate in favor of its coastwise trade, business vessels and citizens. He accused them of discrimination in favor of some things—that they violated the provisions of the treaty requiring "equality of treatment."

Mr. Hitt, Republican minority Member at that time, took exactly the same position, and he discussed that also elaborately and to exactly the same effect, and these can be found also in this volume.

The House then passed the bill unanimously and it went to the Senate. Senator Frye reported a bill which was passed in the Senate unanimously, and is on the statute books to-day, and that is the statute which was called to my attention by the gentleman from Michigan. That provided in substance that if Canada does not observe the reciprocal rules of equality of treatment—in other words, if Canada does not grant us equality of treatment with her own citizens in the use of her canals—we would discriminate against her in tolls through the Soo Canal.

The basis of the statute and the reasons for its existence are that the language "equality of treatment" covers coastwise and foreign trade, citizens and vessels.

Remember that was in 1893. Five years later almost the same officials of both nations undertook to frame the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Sir Julian Pauncefote represented Great Britain during all of that time and subsequently in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Mr. Hay was not in public life, but Mr. Adee, who framed the major part of the report sent in by President Harrison in 1892, was in the State Department then and during the framing of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, as he is now. Senator Davis introduced the original bill in 1893 for Canadian discrimination, and made the report on the Hay-Pauncefote treaty in 1900. Senator Frye and Senator LODGE were also in the Senate.

In this House the Member who transmitted most of the complaints was Representative PAYNE, of New York. Many Members of the House will remember that such was the contention, and no question was raised by anyone in this country that the words "equality of treatment" did not embrace Canadian coastwise trade. In fact, such was the insistence of our Government for five years through two administrations, two Presidents, three Secretaries of State, and no one ever objected to this construction in the Senate and the House that the words "equality of treatment" covered both coastwise and foreign trade, all citizens and all vessels. That is the why such language, only stronger, was placed in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, while the words in the treaty I have spoken of—that of Washington—was equality of treatment. The Hay-Pauncefote treaty contains corresponding words, "entire equality of treatment," so that there should be no discrimination.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota has spoken one hour.

Mr. CANNON. I hope the gentleman will be given time to complete his remarks.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman has control of his own time. But I think before he concludes he ought not to leave the subject of this contention without reminding the gentlemen on the other side of the old story in the spelling book that has never been reversed, that it depends on whose bull is gored on how loud they holler. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to show the effect of the construction of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, as claimed by the minority. Remember there is another treaty of 1910, almost identical, the appropriate section of which I will place in the RECORD.

Remember, the construction of the words "equality of treatment" was required by us as embracing both coastwise and foreign trade and was forced by our Government against the contention of Great Britain and the contention of Canada. Such construction is on our statute books to-day by the act of Congress and the two administrations of our Government. Such is the law. Suppose we reverse ourselves by this other treaty with Great Britain at Panama. Suppose we say that although on the Great Lakes the words "equality of treatment" must cover for both Nations vessels coastwise and foreign, all trade, all ports, all citizens, yet in Panama, with the same nation, a similar treaty containing the words "entire equality of treatment, so there shall be no discrimination," excepts our own coastwise trade. What will Great Britain and Canada have to say? Canada will say, "Very well, gentlemen, we accept your construction of your own treaty, but we will put into force the old discriminations against you on the Great Lakes which we contended for before under the same construction you insist upon now, and then see what will happen."

Mr. Chairman, it should be borne in mind that there are three canals at the Soo—two owned by the United States and one owned by Canada. The Canadian canal is by far the best of the three, because it is 6 inches deeper and broader, and the currents around White Fish Point are a great deal better for its use. With the 6 inches of additional depth advantage in the Canadian canal vessels are enabled to carry about 100 tons per inch additional freight. If you will examine a Senate document of the last session, you will find that a board of engineers estimated that each inch will carry about 75 to 100 tons of iron ore or like freight, which is worth on each trip about $100 for each vessel and for the year $2,500.

There were 6,500 vessels, carrying 32,000,000 tons, passed through the Canadian Soo last year, while through our two canals there passed only 23,000,000 tons. Ninety-four per cent of all the commerce which passed through the Soo canals was American coastwise commerce, while only 6 per cent was Canadian commerce. It is obvious that more than two-thirds, probably three-fourths, of all that commerce that passed through that Canadian canal was our domestic coastwise commerce.

Mr. SLAYDEN. And originated with us.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; and it ended with us, most of it being coal and grain and lumber. If we discriminate against Canada and Great Britain at Panama, Canada has an equal right for the same reason under similar treaty agreements to discriminate against us in the Soo Canal and also in the Welland Canal. Last year there passed through the Welland Canal 775,000 tons of American coastwise trade. Canada could then proceed to discriminate against us as to 24,000,000 tons or so of our coastwise trade passing through the Canadian Soo, and 775,000 tons of our coastwise trade passing through the Welland Canal. If you gentlemen force that discrimination in Panama against Canada, then Canada will have exactly the same right to force that discrimination against us in the Great Lakes, and I submit to this committee that is too important a matter to trifle with merely for the sake of helping a few merchants and shipowners engaged in the domestic trade of this country. [Applause.]

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has already shown the committee that probably the American shipping yearly passing through the Canadian Soo Canal is somewhere in the neighborhood of 25,000,000 tons.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Of our coastwise commerce.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. And the estimates of our own coastwise trade through our own canal at Panama, which is involved in this proposition, are only about 1,160,000 tons.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. In other words, we are risking very much to gain very little.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. That is the point.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman now yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. As I understand it, we agreed that Canadian vessels should use our canal and in turn that our vessels should use their canal.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. On the contrary, just the opposite. The gentleman is incorrect about that, as he is in most of his other statements about this matter.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. What I want to ask is this question. They give us something down there. We use their canal and they use ours.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. They do not use ours at all. That is where the gentleman is incorrect, as I say, as usual.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Does the gentleman deny that our vessels do use the Canadian locks?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I have just tried to prove that twenty or twenty-four millions of tons use them every year.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I thought the gentleman disputed that fact.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No; I did not. As I say, the gentleman, as usual, is in error. [Laughter.] I think I know what he is striving to get at. He is trying to say that Canada does not use the American canals?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Does the gentleman deny that they use our locks?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I say they do not appreciably. I do not mean to say that some Canadian vessels do not go through our Sault Canal. Of course they do. They have got a better canal of their own and they use it generally, but once in a while a stray vessel will go through our canal. The situation is this: There is nothing in this treaty agreement with Great Britain concerning Canada that that Government shall have the right to use our Sault on the condition that they give us the right to use their Sault. There is no such provision. The provision is that each Government treats the other on terms of entire equality in the use of all canals.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The Government has never charged any toll on their own ships going through the canal?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. They do not have to go into a treaty to let their own ships go through there?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. And they have never charged toll?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No; but the gentleman knows that if we charge any tolls on that canal we shall have to charge Canada as well as ourselves and ourselves the same as Canada, and that is the point where a great many gentlemen seem to misapprehend. We admit we have the right to say that every vessel shall go through the canal without any tolls at all, but if we charge tolls on Canada we have to charge on ourselves as well as anybody else. And that is exactly the situation at Panama. We can let all vessels go through free, but if we charge any tolls all must be treated alike.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Perhaps the gentleman will answer this while he is at it. I would like for the gentleman to read the short opinion in the case of Olsen v. Smith.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I will discuss that very thing right now.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I hope the gentleman will do so.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The case of Olsen v. Smith, upon which the gentleman relies, is this: In Texas is a law requiring compulsory pilotage as to all vessels, with an exception that as to American vessels in the coastwise trade that such vessels shall be exempt from compulsory pilotage. The question was raised in the courts as to whether that Texas statute was valid, on account of violating the treaty with Great Britain. Remember, this question arose concerning a British vessel coming from a foreign port as against an American vessel coming from a home port. This is the question that was presented to the court of Texas, which then went to the United States Supreme Court.

The United States Supreme Court held in substance this: That the law of Texas, with the exception, which was the exception provided by an act of Congress, incorporated in the State statutes, especially because it was an act of Congress regulating interstate commerce, did not violate the English treaty, which provided that there should be the same charges and dues, if I remember rightly, on English vessels as on our own vessels—that is, from the same port to the same port. The Supreme Court decided in substance that Congress had established different classes of vessels under such construction; sail vessels might constitute a class; that steam vessels in foreign trade might constitute a class; that steam vessels in the coastwise trade might constitute a class; and that Congress had the right under the treaty, if such class of vessels did not violate the terms and provisions and purposes of the treaty, to except such a class from the operations of the treaty as necessary for the purpose of promoting the purposes of the treaty: That is the substance of the decision; and right here let me say there are three kinds of provisions in our treaties in reference to our coastwise trade: First, a general clause of exception of all coastwise trade from the provisions of all parts of the treaty; second, an exception to one particular article of the treaty with reference to coastwise trade; and third, where there is no exception at all. Now, everybody knows that where we expressly and in terms except the coastwise trade from the treaty we can do anything we please concerning such coastwise trade, and nobody can complain. When we except a part of the treaty, say one article, from the operation of the coastwise laws, we can do anything we please concerning that article, but as to the rest of the treaty we are subject to the general provisions, with exceptions by implication.

Now, when we come to the third class of exceptions by implication nobody will pretend an exception by implication will be as broad and as general as an express exception excepting the coastwise trade. So that the courts and diplomatic officials have construed that implied exceptions embrace such a class as carries out the purpose of the treaty and does not violate the terms of the treaty.

The CHAIRMAN. The 10 minutes of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I will have to take 10 minutes more to answer this question. Everybody knows that these treaties of commerce and navigation are made for the purpose of promoting commerce and navigation. That is the purpose of the treaty. Everybody knows that compulsory pilotage is needed in very many ports where there is not business enough to earn good pilots a sufficient living, unless they can charge practically all the vessels which use that port and use that harbor.

For that reason compulsory pilotage is used all over the world for the purpose of furnishing an adequate supply of pilots absolutely necessary for commerce and navigation, and that was the reason for the use of compulsory pilotage at Galveston. Everybody knows, too, that in the coastwise trade of any country steam vessels make many trips, some of them several a day and some of them several trips a week, and that many of these vessels are small with a small business. If those coastwise vessels were subject to the same law of pilotage as foreign vessels, possibly making one trip a year, they could not pay, and such business would probably be abandoned.

The result is that by the common acceptation of all the nations steam vessels in coastwise trade are excepted from pilotage laws, and in this country we have this additional provision that such vessel must itself carry a pilot duly licensed by our Government, which requires that he shall be an American citizen. So that this exception, provided by the statutes of the United States, substantially requires that where an American steam vessel in the coastwise trade has a pilot who is an American citizen, such vessel need not be under compulsory pilotage for these reasons. Now, that kind of provision carries out the purpose of the treaty of navigation. It provides business to help foreign trade. It carries on domestic trade. Instead of violating that treaty, it practically carries out the provisions of it. Now, the United States Supreme Court has held always in construing the provisions of the treaty wherever it affected the general broad question of public or political importance, that it would follow the action of the political departments of the Government; that is, of the executive department or the legislative department. Now, the legislative department has construed that provision as to compulsory pilotage by providing that steam vessels in coastwise trade having on board a licensed American citizen is but carrying out the purposes of our treaty. Under that same uniform construction of the Supreme Court, always since we have had a Government, if any occasion should arise the court would be bound to follow the construction of Congress concerning the Canadian treaty, just as it followed the construction of Congress as to compulsory pilotage.

I think it is evident that that case instead of helping the gentlemen in the minority helps us, because it shows that the courts will follow as to the political and public questions the practical construction of the political departments of our Government.

Now, just note the difference. The exception in that case of compulsory pilotage concerned only a little municipal regulation for the purpose of helping all commerce and competing with none. These gentlemen ask an exception which would cover the trade of continents, which would cover the trade of millions of people and of thousands of vessels. The very purposes of treaties, that all trade should be compelled to be on an equality, compelled to be neutral, fair, and just, are the very purposes for which treaties are created. But the exception which is discussed in this Smith-Olsen case is for the purpose merely of carrying out a municipal regulation and performing some necessary local service.

Mr. DOREMUS. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question? Is it not a fact that in the Olsen case the Supreme Court based its decision upon the express ground that it was no concern of Great Britain what treatment we accorded our coastwise trade?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No, sir.

Mr. DOREMUS. Has the gentleman got the opinion there?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No, sir.

Mr. DOREMUS. It is an easy matter to settle that question.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The court did not discuss it. I am discussing what the Supreme Court has followed in construing these treaties.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Will the gentleman give me time to read a few lines from this decision?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly; read anything you want.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I will read:

Neither the exemption of coastwise steam vessels from pilotage resulting from the law of the United States nor any lawful exemption of coastwise vessels created by the State law concerns vessels in the foreign trade, and, therefore, any such exemptions do not operate to produce a discrimination against British vessels engaged in foreign trade and in favor of the vessels of the United States in such trade. In substance the proposition but asserts that because by the law of the United States steam vessels in the coastwise trade have been exempt from pilotage regulations, therefore there is no power to subject vessels in foreign trade to pilotage regulations, even though such regulations apply without discrimination to all vessels engaged in such foreign trade, whether domestic or foreign.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Is that what the gentleman wanted to read? That is exactly what I have been contending, namely, that Congress has a right concerning every treaty to establish different classes, to provide for a class of foreign trade in sailing vessels; it has a right to fix a class of steam vessels in coastwise trade, with American pilots, for the purpose of carrying out the treaty; not for the purpose of violating it. That is the essence of the whole question. The exception must not violate the language or purposes of the treaty. But it should, on the other hand, make them effective. The court said that Congress was doing right. And Congress said that such is the proper course in that kind of treaty to treat that sort of business. Congress has indicated its views in a similar way as to the language of the Canadian treaty.

Mr. DOREMUS. Is it not a fact that for a great many years no tonnage duties have been levied on the steam vessels in coastwise trade, and still they are levied on the vessels of Great Britain, and Great Britain has never complained of that treatment?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. And I will venture to say there are six or eight different classes of tonnage duties. I do not know how many there are, but I know there are several. But every single one of those classes is either an act of Congress, setting forth a distinct public policy, or else is an exception which contributes to the carrying out of the purpose of the treaty for the promotion of commerce and navigation and the general purposes of peaceful trade. I thought I had covered that. There is one other class of treaties upon which I desire to address the committee for just a moment.

The United States has negotiated many treaties concerning an interoceanic canal, probably a dozen with the different nations of Central and South America, and I have set them forth specifically in my remarks. In every single one of those treaties there is a provision providing for "equal treatment" or "entire equality of treatment," or "perfect equality of treatment" between our business and their business and between our vessels and their vessels and between our people and their people. Now, the United States has construed these words also. In the treaty of 1884 between the United States and Nicaragua, known as the Frelinghuysen-Zelaya treaty, there was this provision in substance, that the commerce and navigation of the two nations should be treated on terms of equality, provided that the coastwise trade is expressly excepted. In other words, in that treaty it was declared, according to the uniform interpretation of those words, that "equality of treatment" covered both coastwise and foreign trade; and when we desired to exclude our coastwise trade from the operation of a canal treaty we had to do it with a special exception, and that was exactly what was done in the Frelinghuysen-Zelaya treaty.

It was also expressly provided in that Frelinghuysen-Zelaya treaty that the canal should not be neutralized, knowing that the nations of the world when they could not secure equality of treatment of the canal would not consent to neutralization also; so that the two must go together.

The construction of that treaty also provided that where we desired to except coastwise trade from the import of the words "equal treatment," or "entire equality," or "perfect equality," we had to expressly say so. And I will defy anybody, in the course of 100 years of the diplomatic relations of this country with all the nations of the world, to show one single exception. On the contrary, a long line of statesmen who for 50 years have written and spoken concerning the Panama treaties have taken the position that this canal was to be built for all the nations of the world and for the commerce of everybody, and that everybody should have equal treatment in passing through the canal.

Up to within the last two or three years nobody had even dreamed that coastwise trade could possibly be excepted. Nobody ever thought that coastwise trade could be excepted until the selfishness and greed of the merchants and shipowners of the coasts in the last few years have tried to imply that exception from the plain language.

Now, let me show you what it means. Remember that there are probably 30 or 40 different treaties of this country containing similar terms. Remember that if we once begin to imply that "equal treatment" leaves out our citizens, other countries will imply the same thing and insist that "equal treatment" will also leave out their citizens.

Undoubtedly Members of this House within the last week have had presented to them copies of a pamphlet from the Vacuum Oil Co., of New York, declaring that they have been discriminated against in their business by the Government of Austria, which is under obligations to treat that company equally with its own citizens. Now, if we once initiate the policy of providing that our commerce and trade and our people shall be excluded from the words "equal treatment," other nations will treat us exactly the same as we treat them. That is what Austria seems to be doing right now, only, like David Harum, it seems to be doing it first. Think, gentlemen, what it means. The foreign trade of this country amounts to more than $3,500,000,000 annually. More than a billion and a quarter of that is made up of manufactured products competing with similar products of other nations. Other nations would be glad to have an opportunity and an excuse to discriminate against us. More than $2,000,000,000 of American capital is invested abroad. These interests ramify into every hamlet and village of our land and they concern many millions of our people scattered over every State. All our people are interested in the equal treatment that our commerce shall receive everywhere all over the world, wherever our trade extends, and unless our commerce and interests are protected equally and fairly we know they will shrink and shrivel beyond measure. If we once initiate a policy of discrimination in favor of our own people and adopt that method, we will find that it will return to plague us a thousandfold, because other nations will go us many times better. If we shall benefit by the canal at all, it will be chiefly by increasing our trade on the Pacific Ocean, as has been so splendidly shown to the committee this afternoon by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH]. What will every one of those nations having treaties with us containing such words do if we notify them that, although we have pledged ourselves to observe the rules and articles in our canal treaty, yet we intend to violate them, so far as we are concerned, by letting in our coastwise commerce free and discriminating against their coastwise commerce? What will they do? They will discriminate against us in return. Our competitors in Europe will expect and help them to discriminate against us. Such a policy will injure us a thousandfold.

Gentlemen, at the beginning of this great enterprise we can not afford that kind of business. There is only one thing which we can do and that is to observe the good faith that we have pledged to the nations of the world, to observe the good faith which is clearly expressed and promised in the treaty, and to observe the good faith that we owe to ourselves. And when that canal shall be opened to everybody, all nations, all trade, on terms of entire equality and justice, then the canal will be a benefaction to us and to mankind. [Applause.]

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether I have drawn the right inference from the remarks of my friend from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] regarding the neutrality of the canal. Does the gentleman hold that if we practice discrimination against other nations, those powers will not consent to the neutralization of the canal?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I think that would be the only possible inference from the doctrine laid down by the publicists and our own authorities.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. FINLEY having taken the Chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 18960. An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill and joint resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4007. An act for the relief of the J. Kennard & Sons Carpet Co.; and

S. J. Res. 107. Joint resolution authorizing the granting of permits to erect reviewing stands in connection with the unveiling of the Columbus Memorial Statue on the Union Station Plaza to the citizens' general executive committee of the Columbus memorial unveiling.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 14052. An act authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to issue certain reports relating to cotton.

OPERATION OF PANAMA CANAL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN] 30 minutes, and then the other side will take charge.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from California [Mr. KNOWLAND], my colleague upon the committee, and the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY], I think quite disingenuously, have undertaken to leave the impression with this committee that this is a controversy between the railroads and the people. The railroad bugaboo is exploded often enough on the hustings, without being made the basis of promoting a bad cause in the House of Representatives, and the unfairness and the absolute inapplicability of the insinuation to this controversy is so apparent that perhaps it ought to have a passing notice.

In my judgment the railroads of the United States are practically indifferent as to whether there shall be free passage through the Canal or a toll of $1 per net registry ton. The railroads are vitally interested in the question as to whether they may own, directly or indirectly, the ship-transportation companies and therefore practically stifle competition through the canal. This committee has taken up that subject and has put into this bill, and the majority of the committee in this report are standing for a provision which prevents and forbids railroad companies, either by common stock ownership or in any other manner, from being interested in lines of shipping engaged in this coastwise trade which might be competitive with the transcontinental railways. And I hope I will be indulged to say that a bill introduced by myself upon that subject is the basis, almost in its exact language, of the first paragraph of section 11, which settles that competitive policy as against the railroad companies. The people of the Pacific coast are vitally interested in that question, as is any citizen who desires to see absolutely free commerce on the high seas, in order that we may have absolutely competitive conditions with the railroad companies between the coasts. But this question whether 50 cents a ton, the highest that it is anticipated will be put upon the actual cargo or freight ton upon the commerce going through that canal in the coastwise trade, is an absolutely insignificant consideration, which does not in any sense go to the core of this question of competition.

I have not placed my opposition to the proposition for free tolls for the coastwise traffic upon the basis of the legal side of the argument, although it does seem to me that the legal argument so masterfully made by my colleague upon the committee, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS], who has just taken his seat, is practically unanswerable. And now that it has been made a demonstration that the Government and the people of the United States are vastly more interested, not only because of the international right of this proposition, but because of our own financial interests in maintaining that doctrine, I have, from this moment forward, no concern as to what this House or this Congress will do upon the subject, because we are asked, by virtue of showing a little additional favoritism to some coastwise commerce on the seas, which is estimated by our experts will amount in the first year to about 1,160,000 tons, to risk important advantages which we now enjoy in our coastwise commerce on the Lakes of something like 25,000,000 tons in our relations with Canada. I think that if the Canadian Government were the real party to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which it is in effect, as well as Great Britain, the applicability of the argument of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] to the coastwise trade would be appreciated, because a moment's reflection will show how vitally the Canadian people are interested in that proposition. They have many products that enter into direct competition with the products on our Atlantic and Pacific coasts. For example, a boat starts from Seattle loaded with salmon bound for New York. A British vessel starts from Vancouver loaded with salmon from their own great fisheries upon that coast. Under the doctrine here proposed, the destination of both boats being New York, it being in strictly competitive commerce—the Canadian people with our own—the Canadian boat would have to pay toll and the American boat could pass through free. So I think a little reflection will show that the Canadian people are interested in this coastwise proposition.

But I base my argument for the brief time that I shall address the House upon other considerations altogether—on the question of policy and fairness in the adjustment of the relations growing out of this great canal enterprise. I oppose free tolls, although I may say that in the first instance, before these hearings, my inclination was toward the idea of free tolls to the American coastwise trade. I was possessed of the general idea that there was something the matter with our merchant marine, and perhaps by giving it some favoritism in connection with the coastwise trade we might promote the merchant marine. I have come through the investigation with an entirely different idea of the situation.

There is something the matter with the American merchant marine, but it is more deeply seated than the little question of 50 cents a ton upon the cargoes of the vessels. I was talking a few days ago with a prominent shipbuilder of the United States. He said that the great handicap to a vessel flying an American flag in the merchant marine grows out of the original cost of the vessel. The proposition of labor on the high seas is an element, but not nearly so important as the original investment. The coal question is a larger factor than the labor upon the ship in its operation, but back of it all is the fundamental difficulty that the American ship costs from 40 to 50 per cent more to purchase or build in the United States than it does abroad, and this gentleman gave a reasonable explanation of that. He says the ships made on the Clyde and in the foreign shipbuilding yards generally are standardized; that they are made after a general plan and pattern. You go to a certain shipbuilder on the Clyde and tell him that you want a ship of a certain size or a certain shape, and he will say, "I do not make that kind of a ship, but there is another place a little way up here where they do do that kind of work." The work is standardized and the cost of production is thereby much reduced. The shipbuilder said that the American yards have not become standardized from the fact that the types of vessels are of such great variety. But he says that that problem is being solved, and that when American yards are standardized, each yard building its own type of ships, that then the conditions at home and abroad will not be so very wide apart.

But that is a diversion. I oppose free tolls to coastwise vessels because it is unnecessary for the American merchant marine and because it is unfair to the people of the United States. We ought not to impose on the American people a tax for the benefit of that particular limited portion of our industry upon the seas.

The American coastwise trade is already a monopoly. No foreign ships can engage in it. It is not only theoretically, but practically, a monopoly. One line of ships working on the coast will stop at certain points and another line at certain other points, so that while passing up and down the same general territory there is very little competition one with another. If we were to favor any particular part of the merchant marine, we ought to favor the part that needs assistance, that part which undertakes to fly the American flag in foreign commerce. These gentlemen from the Pacific coast and the Atlantic coast urge free tolls for the American coastwise trade, but they do not go further and advocate free tolls for the vessels that fly the American flag in the foreign trade. If we were to give free tolls by discriminating in favor of the American ships, we should favor those ships that engage in the South American trade, encourage the ships, when the canal is opened, that are in foreign commerce, and not these coastwise ships that no foreign ships can compete against. The ships that start from New York and Boston to cultivate that splendid trade which we ought to build up on the western coast of South America must compete with the shipping interest of all the world. And if we were, in this legislation, at the very start to establish any policy favoring one branch of the American shipping over another, for one I would favor collecting the toll from the coastwise ships that have a monopoly of the trade and give it for the encouragement of the American merchant marine that has the courage and hardihood to enter the commerce of the high seas and open the markets of foreign countries for our vast, growing manufactures and for our surplus products of the farms.

What will be the effect of the opening of this canal upon the coastwise shipping? Most beneficial in every way. The testimony before the committee clearly shows that the moment that canal is in operation the lines of ships that carry commodities between the two coasts—the Pacific and the Atlantic—and return will gain by going through the canal in the cost of transportation in the neighborhood of $4 per ton for actual cargo of freight carried.

Mr. Dearborn, the president of the American-Hawaiian Co., one of the most important shipping companies plying in this traffic, a company which is building now some 12 or 13 new ships to increase their ability of transportation to the extent of something like 500,000 additional tons per year, practically stated their operations by way of Tehuantepec of unloading upon the one side and taking across by the railroad and reloading on ships on the other side, as compared with passing through the canal, which they can do when the canal is open, ought to account for a saving to them of in the neighborhood of $4 per ton. What does that mean upon the rates between the two oceans. Citrous fruits from California now distributed altogether by rail cost $25.76 a ton, or $1.15 a hundred, from Los Angeles to New York. Mr. Teal, an authority upon that subject, calculates that as soon as this canal is open refrigerated boats can be started with citrous fruits at Los Angeles and landed in New York for $7 per ton. The transfer across the Tehuantepec route is impracticable. Not much fruit is shipped that way. The freight that does go by Tehuantepec perhaps cost between San Francisco and New York on an average of something like $10 per ton. Reduce that down by $4, as Mr. Dearborn says it can be done, and they can be carried at $6 per ton. The railroads, it seems to me, can not possibly compete with this water transportation for any commerce that will bear the allowance of the time necessary for the route, and this Panama route is going to shorten the time of transportation even over the Tehuantepec route by practically one-third. The same witness, Mr. Dearborn, states they now take from San Francisco to New York practically 30 days upon an average for their trips, and although the distance run to Panama will be longer, so much time is lost in loading and unloading and transferring across the Isthmus at Tehuantepec that he estimates 10 days can be cut off that trip and that boats between San Francisco and New York and New York and San Francisco can make the trip in 20 days instead of 30 days. What does that mean? It means the increasing of the earning capacity of the boats practically by one-third, by the saving of one-third of the time, which is an additional advantage to the shipping through the Panama Canal, over and above the $4 saving already referred to.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. HAMLIN. I want to also remind the gentleman that in Mr. Dearborn's testimony he said that the fact that they could go through the canal without breaking cargo was a very great item as compared to their being compelled to transfer now at Tehuantepec on account of breakage and stealing, and so forth.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. There are necessarily very serious losses in that way.

Mr. KENDALL. How long does it take to go through the canal?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. About 12 hours for the transfer through the canal. It takes that many days to unload at Tehuantepec and send it across the Isthmus and reload on the other side.

That ship company, I say to the credit of American enterprise, is making a success of the business now, and will make a greater success when this canal is in operation. It encountered very great losses at first in its effort to handle that trade. A very large portion of their cargo is sugar, and the natives of that southern country have a sweet tooth, and the result was that the company lost literally tons of sugar in transfer across the Isthmus at Tehuantepec. My understanding from his testimony—I do not desire to be unfair—is that this saving of $4 between the two routes in favor of Panama covers a fair estimate of their loss in the transfer at Tehuantepec.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. The difference of cost to which the gentleman from Missouri called attention is included in the $4?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I think so. I think that is a fair interpretation of the testimony. After opening up a transportation route which gives the seaboard States on both oceans practically a clean reduction of $4 per ton in the transportation of every ton of cargo that can be induced to go by way of water, the gentlemen from the Pacific coast are here insistent, as though the very life of the coast depended upon it, that in addition to that $4 per ton we must add another 50 cents per net cargo ton to repay the expense of going through the canal.

I proceed now to state that in my judgment it would be grossly unfair to the general interests of the people of the entire country to do that. This canal is being built. It is not yet being paid for.

The cost of the canal will be approximately $375,000,000. Congress has authorized the Department of the Treasury to issue bonds covering the entire cost. As a matter of fact, 2 per cent bonds to the extent of $85,000,000 have been issued, and we have issued quite an amount of 3 per cent bonds, and undoubtedly the balance of the issue will be at 3 per cent. What will be the cost per year, the necessary cost for operating this canal in the interest of the commerce of the world? Col. Goethals and his expert engineers have already calculated the necessary organization of force for operating the canal, and they estimate that the cost of operation, with a fair allowance for maintaining sanitation and civil government, will be upon the average $4,000,000 per year. Two per cent interest on our $85,000,000 and 3 per cent interest on the balance up to the cost would amount to $10,393,679 per year, making the necessary outlay that the people of the United States must pay every year upon that enterprise $14,393,679 for operating and interest, without any allowance for the military and naval force necessary to police and protect the canal. Col. Goethals estimates that the military force and the military operations necessary will cost $8,500,000 per year and that the naval expense will be $1,200,000 per year; altogether, military and naval expenses, $9,700,000 per year, making a total of a little over $24,393,679, the best estimate we can obtain thus far of what it will cost a year to maintain that canal. Now, personally, I am willing to take a very liberal view of this situation in the interest of commerce. I am willing to say that perhaps never, certainly not for several decades, should we charge anything against that enterprise for military and naval force. We maintain about a certain amount of standing Army and Navy, and I do not know but that it may just as well be engaged in maneuvers and in operations in that part of the world as anywhere else, and, so far as I am concerned, that may be eliminated. But I think that no patriotic financier would very seriously urge that as long as we have interest to pay upon those bonds we ought not properly to recoup the interest we pay out upon that investment, together with the operating expenses. What are the estimates as to what will be the traffic through the canal? We have had estimates from different sources, and, personally, I think that the figures of Dr. Johnson, the commercial expert from the Pennsylvania University, who has been in the employ of the Government for some years in connection with this canal question, are as reliable as any advance estimates can be, and he estimates that the business of the canal for the first year of its operation will be 10,000,500 tons net register. I think there is a general agreement between the members of the committee and with the departments of the Government interested in these matters that probably the first experimental toll that should be put upon ships going through the canal should be $1 per net register ton, which would be approximately 50 cents per cargo ton. In this bill the President is limited to not more than $1.25 per net register ton and not less than enough to pay operating expenses.

If those figures are right as to the tonnage that will go through the canal, we would have the first year receipts of $10,000,000, out of which we could pay $4,000,000 operating expenses and would have $6,000,000 to apply upon our $10,000,000 of interest. Now, personally, I believe that for the first 10 years' operations of the canal we ought not to be ambitious to do more than pay the operating expenses and the interest. If the world's commerce through the Panama Canal shall increase sufficiently, I believe at the end of the first decade a portion of the income can be applied upon the principal, and certainly no American citizen can object if in the course of several decades the principal itself could be wiped out. Certainly we would be derelict in our duty as Representatives if we do less than provide by these tolls for the operating expenses from the beginning.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I do.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Is it not a fact we could more than double the operating expenses and still not tax every coastwise ship on the estimated tonnage?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I am inclined to think we could. The coastwise tonnage is not a large item.

Mr. MADDEN. It is only about a million and a half tons a year.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. The estimates of the first year's coastwise trade is 1,600,000 tons. It is an item insignificant in amount in comparison to the importance of treating the great commercial nations of the world with absolute impartiality in the operation of the canal.

Great Britain may send large shipping through that canal in its trade with the Orient, or she may divert her oriental shipping elsewhere if offended by our giving certain preferences to our coastwise trade which we deny to the Canadian coastwise trade, and I think this would result in a loss in revenues to the canal.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me? Canadian coastwise trade is foreign trade from Canada to some other nation?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. It may be from Canada to some other nation, or it may be from Canada to the United States.

Mr. CANNON. That is foreign trade.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. But that is merely a name, and it affects the commerce of Canada just as surely as though you give it some other name. At the beginning of my remarks I gave an illustration of the reason why Great Britain and Canada are interested in this proposition.

A shipload of salmon may start from Vancouver to New York, and a shipload of the same commodity may start from Seattle to New York, each interested in that commerce. The Canadian would have, to begin with, our tariff wall to get over, which is one handicap, and in addition it would have very good reason to complain if in its efforts to get through the canal to its legitimate port it must pay 50 cents per freight ton upon its entire cargo and a competitor from Seattle pass through free of toll.

Mr. CANNON. But if the gentleman will allow me, the same argument would let all the commerce of all the world through. Canada, a foreign government, a part of Great Britain, passes through the canal to our markets. That is just as much foreign as if Japan passed through the canal to our markets. Therefore, it seems to me, with all due respect to the gentleman, that his illustration is not an apt argument for the reduction of a tax on our coastwise trade.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I will answer the gentleman that I think it as an apt argument. When my good friend from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] was making his argument those who were asking for free toll on the coastwise trade admitted that we were not at liberty to give free toll to foreign trade. Of course a very specious suggestion could be made, which was made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, that foreign ships could not enter into our coastwise trade now and are not interested in it.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman's idea is that if the United States——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Dakota has expired.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I would like 10 minutes more.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The gentleman from South Dakota wants 10 minutes more. Will the gentleman give his consent?

Mr. ADAMSON. There are some gentlemen who want to get away on the boat to-night.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I will close in five minutes if you will yield me that.

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. And I yield five minutes additional, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I may say, Mr. Chairman, that this question of absolute legal right under the treaties to make distinction in favor of our own coastwise trade has not seemed to me to be a matter of very vital importance, anyway. I think most of those who argue in favor of it concede that as to our foreign trade and our ships entering into foreign trade we are not in a position to make a concession of that kind. That is the position of the Commissioner of Navigation, who was an urgent advocate of free tolls to all American ships, whether in the coastwise trade or otherwise. If we want to get these subsidies or these special considerations for American ships, or have a monopoly of any particular trade, let us do it by an indirect provision, appropriating to them the amount of the tolls, although it is a type of morals in diplomacy that I concede I do not subscribe to with any enthusiasm; that when you get away from home and deal with foreign nations you can do what we never allow one American citizen to do against another—that is, to do by indirection what you promised not to do.

If the gentlemen on the Pacific coast do not think they are going to get a sufficient benefit by this canal, offer an amendment here which will donate the amount of tolls as subsidy to the ships. But when you do that give it to the ships that go into the South American trade, because they have no monopoly of transportation and our coastwise boats have.

Mr. ADAMSON. I hope the gentleman will not offer them encouragement to offer an amendment to this bill. Let them stand on their own proposition if they want it.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I think that any suggestion that I may make in reference to the matter will not be followed by the free-toll advocates. They are smart enough to make it themselves if it can be made to work.

I say this: That if we are going to give any further privileges or subsidies to the coastwise States or communities, who are in the very nature of things to be the chief beneficiaries from this canal, it is not necessary to give them everything we can scrape together right now. We do not know what is to be the effect of this canal on the commerce of the United States. It is largely experimental; it is largely conjectural.

It is in evidence that of the trade going from the Atlantic to the Pacific coast by the transcontinental railways, at least 90 per cent is a class of commerce that can be accommodated by going by boat; and while our experts think that not over 10 per cent of the transcontinental freightage, the through freight, is going to go by boat, yet I think they are too low in their estimates. If 90 per cent of the traffic between the Atlantic seaboard and the Pacific can go just as well by boat as by rail it certainly will go by boat, for water transportation does not cost over one-third of transportation by rail. I think we had better hold free tolls in reserve out of consideration for the balance of the people until we know whether the great benefits of this vast enterprise are going to be distributed over the country with anything like equality.

It is not impossible but that, if we put through free the coastwise trade by means of the Panama Canal, the through freight carried now by the transcontinental railways would be so far diverted the other way as to make it impossible for those railroads to operate, depending alone upon the interior commerce, without a large increase in freight rates for local or intermediate traffic.

And we of the intermediate States, from Indiana to Nevada, and from Canada to Mexico, may find, if we throw down the last card that we have in this game at the very outset—we may find ourselves taxed to pay the interest on this great indebtedness, which inures mostly to the benefit of the coastwise trade—that we will be further taxed by increased freight rates between the coastwise cities and intermediate States. And, in my judgment, it is an absurd policy on our part now, in addition to giving these coastwise States a reduction of $4 a ton in their transportation, to listen to their cry and to their demands for 50 cents more per ton at the opening of the canal.

If, as we hope, this great enterprise shall operate for the benefit of the people of the entire Nation, and we find that by making an additional concession of free tolls to the shipping companies—for this is a question purely of the whole people on the one side and the shipping companies on the other—if we find that we can make further compensation to them by subsidy or otherwise, we should wait until it can be shown that this can be done in justice to the people of the entire country without unduly magnifying the benefits to be derived from this great undertaking by the people of the coastwise localities. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, by direction of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] I yield one minute to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER].

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire at this time to discuss this proposition at length, but I am in favor of anything that will build up our merchant marine. My friend, Lewis Nixon, of New York, who has given great study to this proposition, addressed a letter to the New York Chamber of Commerce on the 6th day of February last, and I ask leave to incorporate in my remarks that letter to the chamber of commerce.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by the insertion of a letter. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the letter referred to:

LETTER TO THE PRESIDENT AND MEMBERS OF THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK, IN DISCUSSION OF THE REPORT AND RESOLUTIONS OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN COMMERCE ON PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

[By Lewis Nixon.]

NEW YORK, February 6, 1912.

To the President and Members of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York.

GENTLEMEN: The report of the committee on foreign commerce and the revenue laws on Panama Canal tolls in the Monthly Bulletin of March, 1912, is so misleading in its general tenor that a short analysis is called for in the national interest.

I must leave the city for a few days, on the 6th of March, and so can not be present at the meeting on the 7th; hence must use this means of calling attention to the statements contained therein.

The report of the commissioner of navigation has been garbled to bolster up what appears to me an unpatriotic conclusion and misleading statements made as to treaty obligations.

Your committee says:

"When the Panama Canal was first considered it was not anticipated the cost would be as great as the finished result will show."

Many prominent engineers pointed out the certainty of exceeding the first estimates. Once committed to this enterprise, it was known that the United States could not turn back. At any rate, the fact that it will cost far in excess of the sum that our people thought they were to invest in such an enterprise is hardly a good argument in favor of our not forcing those chiefly benefited to pay at least a part of the unexpected expense.

There are extensive quotations from the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, although this treaty, born in misrepresentation and continued in breach of faith, is no longer binding and is not even published in the 1904 Compilation of Treaties in Force, issued by the Department of State.

In quoting article 1 of this supplanted treaty you will note certain * * * after the words "agreeing that neither will ever erect or maintain any fortifications commanding the same or in the vicinity thereof."

What is omitted by the committee is as follows:

"or occupy, fortify, or colonize or assume or exercise any dominion over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, or the Mosquito coast or any part of Central America; nor will either make use of any protection which either affords or may afford, or any alliance which either has or may have, to or with any State or people, for the purpose of erecting or maintaining any such fortifications, or of occupying, fortifying, or colonizing Nicaragua, Costa Rica, or the Mosquito coast, or any part of Central America, or of assuming or exercising dominion over the same."

I can not believe that the members of your committee are so unacquainted with American history as not to know that the conversion of English lumber camps on the eastern coasts of Honduras and Nicaragua into what was practically British territory, through virtue of occupation in anticipation of the building of the Nicaraguan Canal, was considered by American statesmen of that period as a virtual abandonment by us of the Monroe doctrine, as it was and is to the present day.

So, acting in good faith and believing Great Britain would keep her promise, as supplied above, though omitted by your committee, the treaty was ratified and proclaimed. In 1848 England, under the mask of Mosquito Indians, seized and occupied Greytown. After the treaty was once signed England continued in possession, even supporting the farce of a Mosquito Indian king.

Just so long as it seemed possible that the Nicaragua Canal would be built England continued in possession, getting the Austrian Emperor to bolster up her claims by indorsing Great Britain's guardianship of the coast, Great Britain then converting the lumber settlement of Belize into a Crown colony. In 1891 and 1892, when work was being vigorously carried on upon the Nicaraguan Canal under Menocal, we find an English syndicate busily engaged in railroad building and English influence reflecting upon the good faith of the United States in the capital of Nicaragua, saying that our country would not keep its promises, and holding out the hope to Nicaragua that the Republic would be given the sovereignty of the coast. Local discontent was freely used as an excuse for interference and to betray treaty promises. In 1894, after work was abandoned in Nicaragua, that part of the Mosquito coast lying abreast of Nicaragua was converted into the Department of Telaya of the Republic. But England still occupied Belize. It will be noted that no mention is made in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of fortifications in the West Indies. We had no territory there, but England did.

It was upon the flimsy foundation of this dead treaty that many Americans based their contention that we had no right to fortify the Panama Canal. This Clayton-Bulwer treaty, while not in any sense binding now, contemplated a canal through territory alien to both the contracting parties, although, as we see, England, in spite of promises written into the treaty, kept her grip on contiguous territory.

But the Panama Canal is through our territory, under own own flag, and is paid for by us as a Nation.

Now, as to another altogether misleading and inexcusable statement. The committee says:

"This treaty (Clayton-Bulwer) was further extended in 1901 between those respective Governments."

Your committee should know that this is misleading. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty was replaced by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and is no longer to be taken into account. The only common idea is that of neutrality.

The statement of the committee is evidently meant to give the impression that the treaty of 1901 supplemented the treay of 1850.

That there shall be no doubt as to the facts, I quote article 1 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which says:

"The high contracting parties agree that the present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention of the 19th April, 1850."

So long as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty exists we acknowledge two masters for the Canal Zone, and under any and all definitions in international law the delegation to the United States, in article 3 (Panama treaty, 1903), of the sovereignty of such canal is meaningless, as a divided sovereignty over territory under our flag should be impossible under the circumstances.

And yet we are told by the committee that the Hay-Bunau-Varilla of 1903 reaffirms the treaty of 1850, though this treaty confirms our right to use land and naval forces and fortifications to protect the canal.

So the conclusion is drawn by the committee as follows:

"It would therefore appear that unless these treaties (1850, 1901, and 1903) can be abrogated by consent of both parties, the United States could not honorably discriminate in its favor as against Great Britain."

Yet this report is to be taken as a basis for a vote by this Chamber upon the operation of one of the most important works ever undertaken by our Government.

Ignoring the fact the President of the United States finds nothing in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to forbid favoring our own vessels, ignoring the fact that the superseded treaty of 1850 to which the committee harkens back for a frail foothold of argument was violated by Great Britain, we find the committee even ignoring the facts of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Let us quote direct from this treaty and drag no ill-odored bag across the scent.

Section 1 of article 3 says:

"The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war to all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens and subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable."

Section 5 of article 3 says:

"The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal, within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent."

No one could possibly construe such plain statements as in any way but that we are to open the canal "to the vessels of commerce and of war to all (other) nations on terms of entire equality."

All I think will admit that the constitutional authority for building the canal exists in the war power of the United States. Two Presidents have confirmed this view in their statements that this canal is an addition to our war power, as it admits of quick transfer of our naval forces from one ocean to the other.

Yet the committee says that under section 1 of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty that we can not discriminate in favor of our own commercial vessels in the matter of tolls or otherwise, and therefore we can not do so in regard to our own war vessels so that if during war with a foreign power we find an enemy's ship in the canal we can not chase it out, and if it leaves such waters we must wait 24 hours before giving chase. Being given under article 2 "the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal," if engaged in war, our warships finding themselves in the canal, must chase themselves out.

Such interpretation is a reflection upon the general intelligence of the community and we can well understand how the statesmen of other nations hold their tongues in their cheeks at our gullibility and our desire to begin charity abroad. And yet such ridiculous interpretation is a logical sequence to the committee's unqualified reading of section 1, article 3.

The report of the committee thus far is an unanswerable argument in favor of immediate abrogation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty on the score of infringement of our sovereign rights, violation of the Monroe doctrine, and incompatibility with the constitutional operations of the canal. We wanted to get rid of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, as its existence was a reflection on our national self-respect, but why it was necessary to ask a European nation's permission to build and control a canal through our own territory, under our own flag, and with our own money, I am at a loss to understand. Treaties are the supreme laws of the land, but no more so than our Constitution, which we may amend and our laws which we may repeal. At any rate, the treaty for our present purposes means only that we shall treat the vessels of all other countries under our rules on terms of equality, though even this interpretation limits disadvantageously our sovereignty, as I think there should be preferred treatment for the vessels of all the western Republics, even Canada, as against European or Asiatic vessels.

However, we shall now follow other arguments, or, rather, examine their premises.

The committee states:

"The Suez Canal since its opening has charged the same rate of tolls to all nations, though its stock is practically owned by Great Britain and France."

With delightful ingenuousness we are to be led to the conclusion that a canal through territory foreign to both France and England operated by a company in which they both own stock is the same as a canal built, owned, and operated by a government in its own territory, and that only the altruism of England and France prevents their operating it in their own interest. The Suez Canal has paid for itself several times and now pays about 30 per cent per annum, but we hear no movement on the part of the chief user to make it free to all vessels.

The committee says that "it is asserted and generally credited that some governments make returns to their shipping passing through the Suez Canal in the nature of subsidies that in whole or in part offset the canal tolls."

I can see no use for the phrase "generally credited" except to give the impression that such belief is unwarranted.

Following this, that we may get a fuller light upon what the committee would have us believe, we find the committee saying:

"As many of the steamships availing of these subsidies do not pass through the Suez Canal, it can hardly be asserted with fairness that the subsidies are given for canal purposes. Your committee does not feel that it is called upon in this report to discuss the question of subsidies, but to adhere strictly to the question of tolls."

But the committee implies a doubt, draws a conclusion, and then abandons the line of thought.

Why not discuss the question if such discussion be enlightening? Other nations do directly rebate Suez Canal tolls and the committee must know it and know, too, that the subsidies which it tries to make general are in most cases directly voted to equalize such tolls. So why run away from the issue, or must we only provide a free feast of commerce, to which all the world is bidden to partake, at our expense?

The Russian Government in 1909 appropriated 650,000 rubles in exact terms to pay the tolls of the merchant steamers of the Russian volunteer fleet, both for tonnage and for all men, women, and children carried.

The British P. & O. Co. receives in subsidies enough to nearly pay all its canal dues, although it operates through the canal a number of boats apart from mail steamers.

The North German Lloyd receives an annual subsidy on its vessels using the canal of $1,385,000. Japan pays a subsidy of $1,336.947 to the Nippon Yusen Kaisha for its steamers through the Suez to Europe.

The Massageries Maritimes, the largest French company using the Suez Canal, was paid for its lines to China, Japan, Australia, and Madagascar $2,145,000 in subsidies.

Austria specifically provides by law for payment of Suez tolls on Austrian steamers from Trieste to Bombay, Calcutta, and Kobe.

The Swedish Government calculates its subvention to the Svenska Ostasiatiska Kompaniet to represent the amount of tolls paid by the ships of the company for passing the Suez Canal. I think the above not only pertinent, but enlightening.

Let us again quote from the committee's report:

"Although the Commissioner of Navigation in his report just issued favors the payment by the United States Government of tolls upon American vessels, he makes the following statement: 'It is not questioned that the traffic of the Panama Canal should supply revenue for its maintenance and possibly in time for the partial amortization of the expense incurred in construction. Toward this revenue we must ourselves contribute in some way, for even if our treaty obligations will permit us to impose upon foreign nations the entire burden of paying for the canal, not for an instant would there be a disposition to adopt so ungracious a policy or, in fact, could it be commercially feasible.'"

Of course this is all qualified, but it is a very fine distinction in commercial ethics which forbids charging a fair price for services rendered when there is no compulsion as to usage and vessels will only pass through the canal when it is to their advantage to do so.

However, since the committee seems to draw comfort and inspiration from the utterances of the Commissioner of Navigation, I will quote him further: "A deliberate conclusion to tax directly American shipping to pay for the maintenance of that canal when no tolls are imposed on vessels, American or foreign, for the use of our other improved highways will be well-nigh inexplicable save as the definite surrender of the oceans to others by the United States except as we may use its waters from time to time for the maneuvers of our war fleets."

This has an American ring about it.

Further quotations will prove that the Commissioner of Navigation has not "the opinion that tolls should be charged and to all alike," as the committee rather too hastily concludes.

The committee again quotes from the commissioner, though with what object it is hard to judge:

"A long line of treaties binds us to equal tolls on American and foreign vessels entering the improved harbors of New York, New Orleans, San Francisco, and every other harbor, river, lake, and canal within the United States."

Of course they do. I do not deny that we give much for nothing and that we have been worsted in practically every one of our commercial conventions.

But such river and harbor improvements are for our own commerce, while the canal may be used by vessels that never reach one of our ports and in direct competition with us.

A policy deliberately adopted which aids other vessels in our trade undoing is monstrous and unpatriotic. Does the committee wish the chamber to think that there is no difference in their respective effects upon the national economy between the Panama Canal and Ambrose Channel?

While swallowing the camel of $24,550,000 tolls on the Suez Canal for 1910, the committee strains at the idea of $14,500,000 for the Panama Canal.

As the best and fullest use of the canal for several years will be by foreign vessels, why not let those vessels, which from our inadequate equipment will reap the greatest profit and develop their own countries' trade, pay charges in proportion to advantage obtained? The Suez Canal started with tolls of 10 francs per gross ton, with a surtax, but they are now about $1.30 per net ton. There is every reason why we should start with an adequate toll, which can be lowered as the volume of travel increases.

It will be found necessary in all probability to write off the cost of the canal and to be content for at least a number of years to pay operating charges of all kinds, and by a surtax to raise a sum for insurance against accidents, such as earthquakes or other troubles, renewals, and wear and tear.

On such a basis $1 per gross ton would be sufficient. The net ton is not a true measure of the bulk or volume of the vessels, and hence the gross ton should be employed as being the more equitable standard by which to gauge charges. The committee knows the difference between gross and net tonnage, but ignores it. The surtax might be levied on passengers or goods which do not come from or go to United States ports.

As regards the coasting trade, there is a vast difference between domestic and foreign transportation. It is claimed that the coasting rates will serve to regulate railroad rates. We have from the beginning preferred our coasting vessels by constitutional regulation of trade, and our coasting trade is prosperous, and with naval orders keeps alive the shipbuilding industry.

There is no question in anyone's mind as to our right to prefer our coasting vessels, such preference being within the constitutional power to regulate commerce.

The committee is here to be criticized more than at any other part of its report, for while not passing upon preference for the coasting trade it shuts out such preference in its resolution by recommending a toll of $1 per ton on all tonnage passing through the canal.

Let us see how the committee disposes of this most important problem:

"The question of American shipping doing a coastwise tonnage passing through the canal free of tolls is a most difficult one to solve. There is a great diversity of opinion, and until this matter has been definitely determined by our Government in relation to the existing treaties with Great Britain and other countries your committee does not feel qualified to pass upon it."

But does the committee give their country the benefit of the doubt and qualify their recommendation? Not at all. They ask the chamber to pass the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York favors a rate of $1 per ton on all tonnage passing through the canal, and urges upon Congress to take early action upon this important matter."

Not a single exception. The committee interprets the treaties and settles the coasting-trade preference at one blow. How the chancelleries and the shipping rings of our European rivals will rejoice at the sounding of such attack upon American shipping by New York's great chamber of commerce.

I am not building vessels any more and can not be charged with a selfish interest in this great question, but I am at a loss to understand why I find myself so often combating un-American policies. We see our dependence upon the oceans progressively increase, and while we rail at monopoly on land we look with complacency upon the growth of an all-powerful monopoly upon the seas in the ships of our commercial and political rivals and in the arts and accessories of navigation.

This chamber should go much further in its recommendations.

The Spooner Act provided for building the canal, but not for its operation. The splendid work done by Goethals and Gorgas and the great men on the Goethal staff, such as Hodges, Devol, and Sibert, should not be lost in usefulness to the Nation. A plan of control, including the physical, such as upkeep and operation; sanitary; fiscal and civil, such as schools, courts, and police, must be studied. This chamber should have views upon such questions which would be of use; at any rate it can urge upon Congress the importance of an early determination.

But in the adjustment of tolls we shall see the greatest measure of good or ill for the American merchant marine. If you are not willing to aid in the building up of our merchant fleet through differential tolls, that is a question of conscience alone. But do not quiet that conscience by believing that any treaty stands in the way of preferring our own.

I oppose the resolutions offered because the premises upon which they are based are misleading and incompetent and the resolutions themselves carelessly drawn and harmful.

I beg to submit the following substitute resolutions:

The Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, having considered the problem of tolls upon the Panama Canal, recommends as follows:

1. That for the next 10 years the interest on the canal bonds shall not be charged against the tolls.

2. Foreign vessels in the foreign trade to pay a toll of $1 per gross ton register if of foreign build; foreign vessels built in the United States to pay 30 cents per ton; United States vessels in the foreign trade to pay 20 cents per ton; United States vessels in the coasting trade to pay 10 cents per ton; no charge to be made for United States men-of-war; men-of-war of other nations to be charged as merchant vessels; vessels in ballast to pay half rates.

3. Any surplus over operating expenses from the sum above collected shall be placed in a special fund, to be expended for canal purposes or amortization of bonds, as decided by Congress.

This sum shall be further added to by a surtax on all vessels not carrying cargoes to or from United States ports of 10 cents per gross ton, regardless of flag; and on all passengers not coming from or going to American ports on the vessel which brings them to the canal there shall be a charge of $2 each.

4. That this chamber urge upon Congress the need of immediate legislation fixing the control of the Canal Zone and the operation of the canal.

I need not point out to the chamber the delicate ground upon which it stands in accepting a report of a committee as a basis for action, which report attempts to construe a treaty in such a way as to hamper our country in disputes which may arise under this treaty in the future.

I have not hesitated to put facts strongly before the chamber, as I have considered it my duty to do as an American citizen, glorying in my selfishness in my country's interests.

I am always ready to discuss such questions and am sending a copy of this letter to each member of the committee.

I trust that it will be found that in the rush of other duties they have not fully weighed the questions upon which they report and that they may go more fully into the subject before committing themselves to a policy the only arguments for which are un-American arguments.

Very respectfully, LEWIS NIXON.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I make a similar request, and ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, at the instance of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, it is impossible for me in the time allotted to me to discuss this question as I would like to. I wish to discuss it from the standpoint of the American merchant marine. I will say, in passing, that I am not undertaking to reflect the views of the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman, for I do not know the views of the committee as a whole. I do know, however, that the members of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries are all very anxious to do something to restore our American merchant marine in the foreign trade.

It is true that our coastwise merchant marine is greater than that of any other nation, and if we include our coastwise merchant marine we have a larger merchant marine than any other nation save Great Britain; but it is a source of humiliation to American citizens that more than 90 per cent of our foreign trade is carried in foreign ships and has been for many years past. I will not undertake to go into the causes of the decline of our American merchant marine. They are many and have often been discussed on this floor. But with this bill pending I could not let the occasion pass without suggesting to the majority of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce that, if it may be done consistently, they should be willing and anxious to respond to this demand and concede something to our American merchant marine.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman suggest what could be yielded to our American merchant marine in this bill that would benefit it?

Mr. ALEXANDER. If the gentleman will be patient, I will try to elucidate that question.

So far as the general features of this bill are concerned, they have my approval, so far as they relate to the administration of the Canal Zone, although the bill lodges vast and almost autocratic power in the Executive; but I recognize the peculiar situation in the Canal Zone and in the administration of the canal, and I am not disposed to question the wisdom of this legislation for that reason.

I wish to say, further, that I am in entire accord with the committee in the legislation proposed by section 11 of this bill, and I shall support the substitute for section 11 that will be offered by the committee.

I do not believe that the railways of the country should own and operate ships; and while this bill is intended primarily to provide for the administration of the Canal Zone, as it has undertaken to legislate upon this other question which I regard as a large and important question, I shall support the substitute for section 11, which I understand will be offered by the chairman of the committee [Mr. ADAMSON], because it is a notorious fact that our coastwise trade, both on the Atlantic and on the Pacific, is controlled by the railroads; that there is not a line of ships between New York and Galveston or on the Pacific Ocean that is not controlled for the most part by the railroads of the country. So long as that is true, we can not have that open competition between the waterways and the railroads that all thoughtful men agree is necessary.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will my colleague yield just there?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. I want to call the attention of my colleague to the testimony before the committee that the American-Hawaiian Steamship Co., of which Mr. Deering is president, is an independent company, not one dollar of the stock or interest in which is owned by any railroad.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Where does that line operate?

Mr. HAMLIN. In the coastwise trade. I want to call the attention of my colleague further to the fact that he says he does not object to tolls being levied upon the coastwise trade. He has not asked for free tolls. Not one dollar of the stock in that company is owned by any railroad company, so he says.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield on that point?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If I recall, it appears in the hearings; but, whether it appears in the hearings or not, it is a fact that that steamship line is operated in connection with a railroad.

Mr. HAMLIN. Oh, no; that is not in the hearings at all.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. That is a fact.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Their relations are so intimate with the railroads that there has never been any friction between them. There is no competition between them, and from all appearances they are in perfect accord. Yet that company has been quoted from time to time as a justification for canal tolls. Just as soon as they do come in competition, just as soon as they do make a lower rate than the railroads, then there will be friction between them; and, like most other lines that have dared to do so, it would not be long until they would be put out of business. But whatever that relationship may be, it is one of comity and friendship, and there is no fraction between them.

Mr. HAMLIN. In the interest of accuracy of record, I want to say that the testimony by Mr. Dearborn is undisputed that there is a competition between his ships and the transcontinental railroads, and that they always cut under the railroad rates. He said he kept his ear to the ground, and when the transcontinental railroad companies made a rate his company made a lower rate, and that not one dollar in his company is owned by the railroad companies; and that statement was not disputed before the committee.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I undertook to read the testimony, but I did not read it in full, and I am unable to state what the fact is in that regard, but the committee of which I am chairman is charged with an investigation of the relationship existing between these different shipping lines, and we may reveal a different state of facts.

Now, I do object to section 5 of the bill, or that part which undertakes to commit us to the doctrine that under our treaty relations with Great Britain we may not discriminate in favor of American shipping. If it was intended that this question should go over for future consideration, why undertake in this bill to make a declaration of that kind? Why try to commit Congress to the doctrine both with reference to the coastwise and our foreign trade? Hence I object to this language in section 5:

> No preference shall be given nor discrimination shown, directly or indirectly, to the vessels of any nation, its citizens or subjects, other than vessels belonging to the Government of the United States (including those belonging to the Panama Railroad Co.) and the Government of the Republic of Panama, observing the rules and regulations of the Panama Canal.

I say if it was the intention that this question should go over and be considered by future Congresses, that language has no place in this bill. The question should be left open for discussion and consideration in the future.

I must confess that the situation here is an anomalous one. I would think that an American citizen, a Member of this Congress, jealous of the rights of his own country and his own flag, would leave it for some other nation to contend that we may not discriminate in favor of American shipping in the matter of tolls on the Panama Canal. I can very well understand why the railroads do not want this discrimination. I can very well understand why the foreign shipping interests do not want this discrimination. But, so far as I am advised, the Government of Great Britain is not contending that we may not discriminate in favor of American shipping in the tolls in the use of the Panama Canal. Hence, I say, this eloquence and this zeal is misplaced.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Further than that, it is a fact that the leading shipping authorities of Great Britain admit that we have the right to discriminate in favor of our coastwise vessels.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I take the statement of the gentleman from California as correct; I am not advised on that question.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. For a very brief question.

Mr. SABATH. How would this provision benefit the foreign steamship business?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Is it not the gentleman's opinion that if we discriminate in favor of American ships in the use of the canal we would benefit our ships in the foreign trade?

Mr. SABATH. The foreign ships are excluded from doing any business in our coastwise trade.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I am not talking about coastwise trade alone; I take the larger and broader view. I say we should discriminate in favor of American shipping, both in the coastwise and in the foreign trade. That is my view. [Applause.] The greater necessity is in the foreign trade, because in that direction is the greater need to extend our commerce. There is an absence of American ships in the foreign trade. True, our American ships have a monopoly of the coastwise trade, and to save my life, after having heard these learned arguments, I still can not understand how they can justify the claim that we are bound by treaty not to discriminate in favor of American ships in the coastwise trade when foreign ships are excluded from the coastwise trade.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] in his very able speech has undertaken to prove that it will be a violation of the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty for us to discriminate in favor of our vessels in the coastwise trade, and to support his contention refers to the Welland Canal. Yet the two cases are not paralleled in any respect.

We have never asked Canada to let us share in her coastwise trade. Her vessels have a monopoly of that trade, as do our vessels of our coastwise trade. The trade between the United States and Canada on the Great Lakes is foreign trade. The Welland Canal connects international waterways—Lakes Erie and Ontario. The canal is built on Canadian territory and is under the control of the Dominion Government. It is true that in 1888 and again in 1891 representations were made by the United States that the stipulated equality in the use of the canal was denied in Canada. The tolls charged on grain, flour, and certain other articles passing through the Welland Canal amounted to 20 cents a ton, but for some years, by an annual order in council issued before the opening of lake navigation, a rebate of 18 cents a ton was granted on grain carried to Montreal or points east thereof.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. I would suggest to the gentleman that I think it would be of advantage to everybody if he would also insert in his remarks the history of the controversy with the Dominion of Canada with regard to the Welland and Soo Canals. I think the facts regarding that ought to be in the RECORD.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I shall do that.

Mr. TOWNER. I entirely agree with the gentleman that they in no wise carry out the intention of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS].

Mr. ALEXANDER. I quote from Moore's Digest of International Law, volume 3, page 681, the history of that controversy:

> In 1895 the United States and Canada each appointed three commissioners to confer on the question of the feasibility of building such canals as should enable vessels engaged in ocean commerce to pass to and fro between the Great Lakes and the Atlantic Ocean. This action was taken on the initiative of the United States under an act of Congress approved March 2, 1895. (For. Rel. 1895, I, 705–707; report of Mr. Olney, Secretary of State, to the President, Dec. 7, 1906, For. Rel. 1896, lxxiv.)
> QUESTION AS TO TOLLS.
> In 1888 (a) and again in 1891, representations were made by the United States that the stipulated equality in the use of the canals was denied in Canada. The tolls charged on grain, flour, and certain other articles passing through the Welland Canal amounted to 20 cents a ton, but for some years by an annual order in council issued before the opening of lake navigation a rebate of 18 cents a ton was granted on grain carried to Montreal or points east thereof. The effect of this system, which violated, as the United States maintained, the stipulated equality, was aggravated by the ultimate denial of any rebate on cargoes transshipped, as often as was necessary, for passage through the canal from larger to smaller vessels if the transfer was made in a United States port. On April 4, 1892, a new order in council was issued, which, while fixing the canal tolls at 20 cents a ton on freight of all kinds, allowed a rebate of 18 cents on wheat, Indian corn, peas, barley, rye, oats, flaxseed, and buckwheat originally shipped and actually carried to Montreal, or any port east thereof, in case such products were exported, and provided that the right to the rebate should not be lost by intermediate transshipment, if it took place in Canada. (b) By another order in council, dated April 11, 1890, and mentioned by the United States as a discrimination, the toll on cargoes bound eastward was reduced from 20 cents to 10 cents a ton, while the full rate was continued on cargoes bound westward.

The Canadian Government argued (1) that its orders in council, as they applied to Canadian and American vessels alike, did not infringe the treaty, and (2) that, as article 30 of the treaty of Washington, granting a reciprocal participation in special coasting trade and bonded-transit privileges, expressly authorized the United States to suspend those privileges in case Canada should deny the equal use of the canals under article 27, and as article 30 had been terminated on notice given by the United States, the agreed penalty for discrimination which might exist had already been exacted. (c) The Canadian Government proposed, however, as a compromise, to abolish all rebates on condition that the free and equal use of the Sault Ste. Marie Canal should be maintained, and that article 30 of the treaty of Washington should be restored (d).

The United States replied (1) that the treaty guaranteed equality of treatment not merely to vessels of the United States, but also to their citizens; (2) that this equality was violated by the system in question, since it required grain bound to United States ports to pay 10 times as much toll as grain bound to Montreal, and discriminated against American vessels, ports, consumers, and trade routes; (3) that the termination of article 30 of the treaty of Washington by a notice in conformity with article 33 thereof, could on no theory be held to have forever exhausted the power of the United States to retaliate for any failure of Canada to observe the engagements of article 27; and (4) that clear rights conferred on citizens of the United States by treaty could not be purchased by concessions which the same treaty did not require (a).

The matter was submitted by the President to Congress, (b) and by an act approved July 26, 1892, it was made his duty, whenever he should be satisfied that the passage through the Canadian canals of vessels of the United States, or of cargoes or passengers bound to a United States port, was prohibited, made difficult, or burdened by tolls which, in view of the free passage permitted to all vessels through the St. Marys Falls Canal, he should deem unjust and unreasonable, to suspend by proclamation such free passage and impose tolls, not exceeding a certain amount on vessels of subjects of the discriminating Government or on cargoes or passengers in transit to its ports. A proclamation, dated August 18, was issued August 20, 1892 (c).

It specified as the particular ground for action the rebate allowed under the order in council of April 4, 1892, in favor of the Montreal route and Canadian transshipments, this preferential treatment constituting, as was declared in correspondence, "the concrete condition of disfavor to citizens of the United States, which the President was constrained to examine and act upon"; (d) and directed the collection after September 1, 1892, of a toll of 20 cents a ton "on all freight * * * passing through the St. Marys Falls Canal in transit to any port of the Dominion of Canada, whether carried in vessels of the United States or of other nations."

By a Canadian order in council of February 13, 1893, it was directed that "for the season of 1893 the canal tolls for the passage of the following food products: wheat, Indian corn, peas, barley, rye, oats, flaxseed, and buckwheat, for passage eastward through the Welland Canal be 10 cents per ton, and for passage westward through the St. Lawrence Canals only 10 cents per ton; payment of the said toll of 10 cents per ton for passage through the Welland Canal to entitle these products to free passage through the St. Lawrence Canals."

On the strength of assurances that this order was in full substitution of the expired orders of 1891 and 1892, and involved the abandonment of all provisions as to rebates or against transshipped goods, the President, February 21, 1893, issued a proclamation suspending that of August 18, 1892 (a).

By an order in council, dated April 17, 1896, all fees previously exacted from vessels navigating inland waters, when entering or clearing above Montreal, were abolished. It was stated that the Canadian Government, while maintaining its former contention that certain charges exacted in the United States ports from Canadian vessels constituted a discrimination in favor of United States ships, took the action above stated in order that no cause for friction with the United States authorities in regard to the matter should exist (b).

It will be noted that Canada would not at first yield to the contention of the United States, but contended that its orders in council did not infringe the treaty, but proposed, however, as a compromise to abolish all rebates on condition that the free and equal use of the Sault Ste. Marie Canal should be maintained and that article 30 of the treaty of Washington should be restored.

Article 30 of the treaty of Washington, granting reciprocal participation in special coasting trades and bonded-transit privileges, and expressly authorizing the United States to suspend these privileges in case Canada should deny the equal use of the canals under article 27, had been terminated on notice given by the United States.

The President and the Canadian Government failing to come to an agreement, the matter was submitted to Congress, and the act of July 26, 1892, was passed, providing that so long as the President should be satisfied that the Canadian Government should discriminate against vessels of the United States in the passage through the Canadian canals certain tolls should be charged the vessels of Canada for passage through the St. Marys Falls Canal.

The result was that the Canadian Government, by order in council of February 13, 1893, made a new regulation satisfactory to the United States, and on the strength of assurances that this order was in full substitution for the expired orders of 1891 and 1892, the President, on February 21, 1893, issued the proclamation suspending that of August 18, 1892, which was based on the act of July 26, 1892.

Later, the Canadian Government, by order in council dated April 7, 1896, abolished all fees previously exacted from vessels navigating inland waters when entering or clearing above Montreal. Thus the controversy was happily ended.

Nevertheless it clearly appears that Canada never did concede that she had violated any of the treaty rights of the United States. The only way we forced her to make concessions to us was by the Congress passing the act of July 26, 1892, by which we gave Canada to understand that if she did not concede to us reciprocal treatment in the use of the Welland Canal we would deny to her the free passage of her vessels through the St. Marys Falls Canal.

Just what that controversy and its settlement has to do with our right to grant to American vessels free tolls in the use of the Panama Canal, I repeat, I am unable to understand.

It might be bad policy for us to do as contended by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS], but it can not be seriously contended that we violate the terms of any treaty between ourselves and Canada in doing so, and it can not be seriously contended that Canada should be accorded equal treatment with American vessels engaged in the coastwise trade in passage through the Panama Canal under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, unless such treatment may be claimed for the vessels of Great Britain and of all other nations that may apply therefor.

That we have the undeniable right to discriminate in the matter of Panama Canal tolls in favor of vessels of the United States engaged in the coastwise trade and, if we elect to do so, grant them free tolls, is settled by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Olsen v. Smith (195 U. S., 332). In that case the treaty with Great Britain expressly provided that—

> No higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States.

The court held that this treaty was not violated by either the Texas statute or section 4444 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, exempting coastwise steam vessels from the payment of pilotage charges.

Mr. Justice White, now Chief Justice, speaking for the court, said:

> Nor is there merit in the contention that as the vessel in question was a British vessel, coming from a foreign port, the State laws concerning pilotage are in conflict with the treaty between Great Britain and the United States, providing that "no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States." Neither the exemption of coastwise steam vessels from pilotage resulting from the law of the United States nor any lawful exemption of coastwise vessels created by the State law concerns vessels in the foreign trade, and, therefore, any such exemptions do not operate to produce a discrimination against British vessels engaged in foreign trade and in favor of the vessels of the United States in such trade. In substance, the proposition but asserts that because by the law of the United States steam vessels in the coastwise trade have been exempt from pilotage regulations, therefore there is no power to subject vessels in foreign trade to pilotage regulations, even though such regulations apply without discrimination to all vessels engaged in such foreign trade, whether domestic or foreign.

This decision, it seems to me, should settle the question once and for all. But in the absence of any decision by this great tribunal, it should be plain that we have the right to treat our vessels engaged in the coastwise trade as we please, in view of the undisputed fact that no foreign vessel may participate in that trade, and it is no concern of theirs how we treat our vessels in the coastwise trade, whether we grant them free tolls or not.

But it was not my intention to give this phase of the subject more than a passing notice.

The gentlemen entertaining the contrary view, however, have expressed their contention with such earnestness and plausibility that I have felt it my duty to give it more extended notice.

But my contention is that we may not only discriminate in favor of vessels of the United States engaged in the coastwise trade, but that we may discriminate in favor of vessels of the United States engaged in the foreign trade in the matter of tolls in the use of the Panama Canal, and, following my thought on that subject, is it not a little remarkable that the President of the United States, having in view our treaty with Great Britain, should deliberately announce in a message to Congress that, in his opinion, we have a clear right to discriminate in favor of our shipping, not alone in the coastwise trade, but in the foreign trade as well. I quote from the message of President Taft to the Congress in December, 1911 (62d Cong., 2d sess., H. Doc. 343), in which he says:

I am confident that the United States has the power to relieve from the payment of tolls any part of our shipping that Congress deems wise. We own the canal. It was our money that built it. We have the right to charge tolls for its use. Those tolls must be the same to everyone, but when we are dealing with our own ships, the practice of many governments of subsidizing their own merchant vessels is so well established in general that a subsidy equal to the tolls, as equivalent remission of tolls, can not be held to be a discrimination in the use of the canal. The practice in the Suez Canal makes this clear.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Certainly.

Mr. CLINE. I will ask the gentleman if the President does not say the tolls would have to be paid at the canal, and they could be recouped by legislation, and that that was lawful; and does he not say it in that identical communication?

Mr. ALEXANDER. No; his language is:

I am confident that the United States Government has the power to relieve from the payment of tolls any part of our shipping that Congress may deem wise.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. I hold in my hands a letter from the Secretary of State—Secretary Knox—and also a letter from the Secretary of War, Mr. Dickinson, the latter stating that a bill which I introduced which would permit a discrimination in tolls both as to coastwise trade and to foreign trade carried in American bottoms, met the approval of the President of the United States—all approving that proposition under the treaty.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman from Illinois not put that also in the RECORD?

Mr. MANN. I may insert them in the RECORD when I make some remarks.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The Secretary of War, Hon. Henry L. Stimson, in his last annual report, page 54, is equally clear in his opinion that the United States may legally and morally relieve American vessels from payment of tolls for use of the Panama Canal without violating the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. I quote his language:

Involved in the problem of fixing tolls is the question whether the United States has the right under the treaty to pay the tolls on American vessels using the canal. An examination of the treaty and the surrounding circumstances to my mind leaves no doubt as to the right of the United States, both legally and morally, to pay the tolls on its vessels. This is a perfectly recognized practice in respect to the tolls of the Suez Canal, the toll rules of which canal were adopted by the United States in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty for the government of the Panama Canal. At least one of our national competitors in the use of the Panama Canal—Spain—has already taken steps to provide for the payment out of her national treasury of the Panama tolls on one of the Spanish lines which will use that canal. Furthermore, I can see no difference, save in form—provided the tolls for other nations are kept reasonable, as we have also covenanted to do—whether the United States should make this appropriation out of her own Treasury to American vessels, by receiving the toll money from them first and repaying it to them, or by simply relieving them from the payment of tolls in the first place.

The Secretary of Commerce and Labor, Hon. Charles Nagel, in his annual report, pages 102 and 103, entertains the same opinion. His statement is as follows:

Every State in the Union with navigable waters crossing its boundaries furnishes precedents of congressional appropriations for the establishment and maintenance of improvements at the continuing expense of the Federal Treasury and without a dollar's help from the vessels which enjoy the advantages of such improvements. Where the future of American shipping is at stake, and the domestic commerce of both seaboards and the Gulf is involved, there is no apparent reason to depart from a principle which has been so constantly invoked. * * *

The Panama Canal is being built in the belief that it will benefit all sections of the country and nearly every form of American industry. Our merchant ships and shipyards are as essential to the Nation as our battleships. They have at least a claim to equal consideration in canal legislation and appropriations with other American industries. Every argument to tax the American merchant ship which uses the canal would apply with equal force to a tax directly on American cotton, lumber, fruit, coal, grain, and other cargo carried by the ship through the canal. It is feasible to use the canal for the promotion of American navigation in a manner consistent with treaty obligations, with precedent at home and abroad, and with our fixed policy of untaxed navigation on improved waterways.

When the gentleman from Minnesota, in answer to my question, answered "that our Government might refund to American vessels all or part of the tolls paid by them for passage through the Panama Canal, whether in the coastwise or foreign trade," he gave away his whole case, for it is absurd to say that if by the terms of the treaty we may not discriminate against foreign shipping in the matter of tolls we can secure the same result in this direct manner. I say it would not be honorable to do it in that way. It would be a subterfuge and would not be recognized by any self-respecting nation. So that when that concession is made on the part of the proponents of this bill they virtually give away their case.

As I say, I do not intend to further discuss the question whether or not this Government may grant free tolls to our vessels in the coastwise trade without reference to whether or not we may do so in the foreign trade. If the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty were without doubt, if they were clear and unequivocal that we could not discriminate in favor of our vessels in the foreign trade, I do not believe it could be seriously contended for one moment that we may not grant free toll to our vessels in the coastwise trade, and that was the view of the Supreme Court of the United States.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] contends with equal force and eloquence that we may not discriminate in favor of our vessels in the use of the Panama Canal in the foreign trade, and on that question I wish to join issue with him.

He casts aside the opinions of the President of the United States, of the Secretary of War, of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, all distinguished lawyers, as of little weight in the solution of the question.

He seems to overlook another important fact. Although the position of our President on this all-important question has been known for many months, and the question has been given great prominence in the press and magazines of the country, no word has come from the British Government or any other maritime nation, so far as I am advised, that we may not grant to America a less rate of the tolls than to foreign shipping, or for that matter free passage through the Panama Canal. I attach great significance to this circumstance, for if there is any plausible ground on which the position of our Government in this matter might be questioned I fancy Great Britain and other maritime nations would be quick to seize upon it.

I can readily understand why our transcontinental railroads and the foreign shipping interests might support this contention, prompted by selfish interests, and I am not finding fault with them for doing so, but I have been cudgeling my brain to find a plausible reason why my esteemed friend, the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and the majority of that committee should press that view with so much zeal and eloquence. I believe them sincere in their desire to help our merchant marine. I am inclined to think their error lies in misunderstanding the influence and effect the opening of the canal will have upon the future of our merchant marine, and their judgment is controlled by a wish to make the canal pay as a commercial enterprise. In both views I believe they are mistaken. As I view the situation the canal, if wisely administered, will be a valuable asset in the building up of our merchant marine and in the extension of our foreign trade in American ships, not only in South America but to the Orient and other parts of the world.

The gentleman from Minnesota in his construction of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty gives great significance to the language in the preamble to that treaty, that the contracting parties agreed that the canal should be built "without impairing the general principle of neutralization established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty."

Now, from that language, "without impairing the general principle of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention," he gives those words very great weight in construing the articles of that treaty. In fact, he reads them into the treaty and would make them a part of the treaty. To my mind that is indefensible. If we want to have an interpretation of those words, or if we want to interpret those words to see what effect they had or what scope they shall have given in the treaty, let us go to the treaty itself. Now, there has been much said on the question of neutralization, and yet that is a term of wide significance which does not allow a definite meaning and which can not be applied to any specific treaty and made a universal rule of action. It has been violated time and time again in our treatment of the Panama Canal, and to accept those words as a justification for the position of the committee that we may not discriminate in favor of American ships in the use of the Panama Canal, to my mind is entirely untenable. Why, if we take the Clayton-Bulwer treaty as a basis, or if we undertake to interpret article 8 of that treaty and translate the spirit of that treaty into the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, we violate it in many respects. We violated it in our treaty with Panama, because we expressly provide that ships of the Government of Panama shall pass back and forth through the canal free of toll. It is nothing to say that her shipping in tonnage is negligible. We are contending for a principle, and if the contention of the gentlemen on the other side is correct, then we have violated the spirit of that treaty in granting this concession to Panama. If we grant it to Panama we can grant it to the various Governments of South America, but my contention is that we do not violate the treaty in that regard. Then, again, in the fortification of the canal we violate the principle of neutrality in its broad definition.

We are going further. We propose to place a military force on the canal. Is that simply to police the canal and maintain order on that 10-mile strip that has been conceded us by the Government of Panama? Is it possible that we are going to an annual expense of about $10,000,000 for Army fortifications simply for the purpose of policing the canal? Will it be necessary to expend a larger sum for that purpose after the canal is completed than now with many thousands of people engaged in the construction of the canal? Certainly not. There are those on this floor who have contended we could not fortify the canal; that it would be a violation of the treaty with Great Britain. At the same time, unchallenged by Great Britain, we are fortifying the canal. We are going ahead to place an army on the Canal Zone unchallenged by Great Britain, not simply for the purpose of policing the canal alone, but to protect it from hostile attack by any foreign nation. Not content with the declaration of Great Britain that it shall be regarded as neutral, not content with treaties that may be negotiated with foreign nations by which the neutrality of the canal may be recognized, we are preparing, by force, to protect our rights in the Canal Zone and to that great canal. But it is said if we grant discriminating duties to American ships we are violating the rule of equality. Now, just one moment on that question. We are spending $400,000,000 in the construction of that canal. Four per cent interest on that amount would be $16,000,000 a year. We propose to pay, according to the estimates of these gentlemen, from forty to fifty million dollars a year for its protection, maintenance, and operation, and yet notwithstanding that vast expenditure, to which no foreign nation has contributed one penny, notwithstanding the fact that the canal is being built on land to which the Government holds the absolute title, it is solemnly contended here, under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, that we have no right to discriminate in favor of American ships by granting them the use of that canal at a less toll than we grant to foreign ships. The proposition is wholly untenable, to my mind. Gentlemen talk of the doctrine of equality. How could any foreign nation have the courage to make such a claim in view of these facts?

And yet that is the contention of these gentlemen, and they press it with great zeal. Why they should do it, I do not know, unless prompted by the considerations to which I have already referred.

Mr. SULZER. Or anybody else.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I do not understand it. And the other doctrine—that when you levy a toll it does not affect the price of the commodity to the consumer; that it will be absorbed in the rate—is another specious contention. They would have us believe that this barrier is a blessing and that to remove it is a curse and that it is a distinct disadvantage to the American people if we open that waterway and make it free to our shipping between the Atlantic and Pacific coast.

I am quite willing, so far as I am concerned, that our shipping, both in the coastwise and foreign trade, may pay some amount of toll; that they shall contribute toward the maintenance and operation of the canal, but I do insist that when these tolls are framed they should distinctly give an advantage to our American merchant shipping. [Applause.]

But to return to the construction of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. To learn the terms of the treaty we should refer to the treaty itself. Article 2 provides that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscriptions or purchase of stock or shares, and that subject to the provisions of the present—the Hay-Pauncefote, not the Clayton-Bulwer—treaty, the Government of the United States shall have all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

Could language be more clear and free from ambiguity than this?

But it is said that article 3 of the treaty places it beyond peradventure of doubt that in the levying of tolls we must observe the rule of equality as between ourselves and other nations. To do so by giving that rule the interpretation contended for by the gentleman from Minnesota, we must require the following considerations: First, that the canal is built on American territory, purchased at an expenditure of $50,000,000; second, the annual payment to the Republic of Panama of $250,000, beginning February 26, 1904; third, the expenditure of $400,000,000 in the construction of the canal; fourth, the annual expenditure of $40,000,000 to $50,000,000 in the defense, maintenance, and operation of the canal. But how could other nations share the benefits of the canal with us on terms of entire equality unless they would come in and share with us this great burden? [Applause.]

And yet without consideration and assumption of any obligation on their part other than to observe such conditions and charges of traffic as shall be just and equitable what do we, in article 3 concede to other nations? First, that "the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise; that such conditions and charges of traffic shall be reasonable; second, that the canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised, nor any act of hostility be committed within it. And yet these, with some minor provisions, are the rules adopted by the United States as the basis of neutralization of the Panama Canal, according to the very terms of the treaty, and referred to as substantially embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed on the 28th day of October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal.

If it was the intention of the framers of the treaty that vessels of the United States should pay the same tolls for use of the canal why did not the framers of the treaty say so in unmistakable language? Why provide, referring to foreign nations, that the United States should make the conditions and charges of traffic just and equitable? To my mind the only answer is that the right of the Government to fix the tolls for its own shipping was so apparent and fully recognized that the only concession that could be reasonably insisted on was that other nations should be treated fairly and equitably in that regard.

Then, too, the British representative no doubt had in mind the interpretation given to the convention of Constantinople and the fact that the Turkish Government, whose authority was recognized in Egypt at the time the concession was made to De Lesseps to build the Suez Canal, might pass its vessels through the canal free of tolls; that the Russian Government pays the tolls of the merchant steamers of the Russian volunteer fleet; that the British Pacific & Orient Co. receives in subsidies nearly enough to pay all its canal dues; that the North German Lloyd receives an annual subsidy on its vessels using the canal of $1,385,000; that Japan pays a subsidy of nearly equal that amount to the Nippon Yusen Kaisha for its steamers using the Suez Canal; that Austria-Hungary specifically provides by law for payment of Suez Canal tolls on Austrian steamers from Trieste to Bombay, Calcutta, and Kobe; that subsidies are paid by the French Government to its largest company using the canal amounting to about $2,500,000 annually.

In the light of these facts it could hardly be contended that our Government may not remit all or part of the tolls of its vessels using the canal, and it is no cause for wonder that foreign nations are not demanding that our Government should charge the same tolls for American ships as for their own.

Again it is contended by a majority of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, led by their able chairman in his inimitable and facetious style, that if we favor our shipping in the matter of tolls for use of the Panama Canal we will be granting them subsidies; something justly obnoxious to a majority on this floor, if not to the American people. I have been as much opposed to subsidies to our merchant marine as the gentlemen who make their claims. I believe there is a better way to rehabilitate our merchant marine, and as one of the means of doing so the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman has reported to the House a bill for free ships for the foreign trade and for free material, which I hope will be passed before this session closes.

But if the contention of the gentleman is correct the policy of the Government in reference to our great harbor and inland waterways is all wrong.

The river and harbor act of 1884, section 4, provided:

> No tolls or operating charges shall be levied upon or collected from any vessel, dredge, or other water crafts for passing through any lock, canal, canalized river, or other work for the use and benefit of navigation now belonging to the United States or that may be hereafter acquired or constituted.

We have uniformly followed the policy enunciated in that act through all the years since its passage. Has our policy been a mistaken one? Have we erred in not charging tolls at every lock and dam built and harbor deepened at the national expense?

The Secretary of the Treasury recently sent to the Senate a letter transmitting the information that from the foundation of the Government to the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, a total expenditure upon rivers and harbors and canals—excluding the Panama Canal—is $627,098,236.05.

Of that sum, $121,142,554.41 has been expended upon the Mississippi River, $11,425,056.90 upon the Missouri River, and $23,548,338.15 upon the Ohio River, while the State of New York has appropriated a total of $147,000,000 for the enlargement and maintenance of her canals since the State declared them to be free of all tolls.

The balance of the six hundred and twenty-seven and odd millions of dollars has been expended in the improvement of other waterways than those mentioned and in deepening the harbors of the Great Lakes and our Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific seaboards.

The present river and harbor bill as it passed the House carries an authorization for the expenditure of $20,000,000 to secure a 6-foot channel in the Missouri River between Kansas City and its mouth. When completed shall steamboats and other water crafts be charged tolls for the privilege of navigating the Missouri River?

Locks and dams have been built across the Mississippi River at Keokuk at a great outlay of money. Shall all steamboats and other water crafts using the locks be charged tolls?

Immense sums are being spent for locks and dams on the Ohio River to improve the river for navigation. Shall a tollgate be erected at each lock and tolls be demanded of steamboats and other water crafts passing through them?

By the deepening of the harbor at Duluth and other ports on the Great Lakes and by the erection of locks and canals the cost of transporting a bushel of wheat from Duluth to Boston and New York has been reduced, we are told, in the last 50 years from 30 cents a bushel to less than 6 cents, while the movement of ores has been reduced to a very low figure.

Yet all these improvements were made out of the National Treasury. That they were wise and have contributed to the general welfare can anyone doubt?

Are we not all in favor of the freest interstate commerce, and should we make any distinction between that secured by the improvement of our inland waterways and the removal of an obstruction to waterway traffic between the Atlantic and Gulf States and those of the Pacific Ocean? And will not the Panama Canal give added value to our inland waters as carriers of our domestic and foreign commerce? To state the proposition is to give the answer. And yet, from this viewpoint, it would be quite as reasonable to charge American vessels for the use of our inland waterways and harbors as for the passage through the Panama Canal, and the failure to do so in the one instance is as much a subsidy as the other.

Mr. Chairman, I have not discussed what tolls, if any, should be charged American vessels using the canal. Experience will best solve that question. I have undertaken to combat, and I hope successfully, the contentions of the majority of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce that we have no right to permit American vessels to use the canal at a less toll than that charged foreign shipping. I would remove instead of adding to the handicap of our merchant marine.

I would give to our merchant marine every possible benefit in the competition of this, the world's greatest engineering triumph, to the end that some day—and I trust that day is not far distant, when a generous share of our commerce in the world's trade will be carried in ships carrying the American flag. [Loud and prolonged applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] is recognized.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, surely in Panama has the stone that was rejected by the builder become the head of the corner. For this once pestilential sink hole of the American Continent was reserved the great project. Its successful completion will not be an incident; it will be an epoch, and its construction will be an epic. The builders of the Panama Canal, like the victors of a great war, will live in its memories; and already the men who are constructing it are organizing their veterans' association, so that in after days they, like soldiers who have served upon the field of battle, may gather about their camp fires and talk of the times when they were on the canal.

For myself, I believe I can say I would rather build the Panama Canal than be President. In the centuries to come the figures of Presidents will be like a row of telegraph poles across the plains; their names will be known only to bookmen. But the doers of such deeds as the Panama Canal will be far less numerous.

After a campaign of eight years, led by the brilliant Frenchman, De Lesseps, fresh from the triumph of the Suez Canal and inspired by the glory and the experience of that great achievement, the people of France fell exhausted amid the poisonous swamps and disease-laden jungles of Panama. And now, after another campaign of eight years, under the leadership and engineering genius of the greatest engineers in the world—and I am glad to say that after having been over that great project twice I feel that it is going successfully and satisfactorily forward under the most competent management obtainable—but even after this eight years of campaign, backed by the financial resources of this mighty Nation, backed by a Treasury such as De Lesseps and France never dreamed of, the titanic struggle still goes on, and the end is not yet.

Mr. Chairman, I am glad of the opportunity that I have enjoyed to twice personally visit this great project and go over it and inspect it closely and get its incomparably gigantic proportions photographed forever upon my mind. And I am proud and grateful of the fact that as a member, one of the rank-and-file members, so to speak, of the Interstate Commerce Committee I have been permitted to play, or think I was playing, ever so small a part in the legislation which is to provide for the permanent government, the operation, maintenance, regulation, and sanitation of this great engineering project. And I am sorry that my contribution to this debate must be largely in the nature of a contribution to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

It is very obvious that that inspiring line—

The applause of listening senates to command—was not called forth by any occasion such as the present, and for that reason I want to thank the gentlemen who have given way to me in order that I may "say my little say" and put the rest of it in the RECORD and get out of town.

But, Mr. Chairman, I do want to make some permanent contribution to this record, and it seemed, singularly enough, as I listened to the debate—and there have been some very able discussions on this question—that each member of the committee seems instinctively to have followed along a line of his own, a line entirely different from all other Members, so if this rule holds good throughout the debate we will be favored by very extensive and comprehensive literature upon the subject of the Panama Canal.

It has been my ambition to make my contribution to the literature of this debate in the way of the arrangement, in available form, of the testimony adduced before the committee in the hearings upon which the controverted features of this bill rest. Perhaps when this measure is considered in the other body, perhaps when it is considered in the country at large, perhaps when these debates shall be analyzed by future Congresses in the far years to come, when all the gentlemen here present have ceased to be Members of this body, the preservation in succinct form of the testimony and statements upon which the majority of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce based their action in framing this bill will be of far more value in sustaining that action than anything that may be said here by Members on the floor in debate.

PROBLEMS OF THE CANAL.

All the problems in this legislation group naturally about the two main questions of permanent organization and transit regulations. Permanent organization has to do with the future form of government of the Panama Canal and the Canal Zone, and transit regulations have to do with the terms and conditions under which vessels may use the Isthmian waterway. The questions are few and minor which do not fit readily into the one or the other of these principal subdivisions.

The temporary government of the Canal Zone was established and carried on by or under the orders of the President of the United States by virtue of a general grant of plenary power to the President by the Congress of the United States, which grant of power expired by limitation with the life of the Fifty-eighth Congress. For more than seven years now the military, civil, judicial, and constructing powers of the Canal Zone have gone on successfully by Executive order, without organic or statutory guidance or limitation.

Within a few specified limitations, and these, with the exceptions which I shall hereafter specifically point out, of minor importance, the Executive will be given practically the same free hand in forming the permanent as in forming the temporary government of the Panama Canal and the Canal Zone. Upon the form of government the pending bill goes into detail only in the matter of the judicial establishment, which, of course, will not be of primary importance within the bounds of a zone in which the United States will be the sole proprietor and in which only officials and employees of the United States will be permitted to reside.

OUTLINES OF THE BILL.

Section 1 of the bill fixes the boundaries of the Canal Zone and provides for land additions thereto and land eliminations therefrom, by means of exchanges with the Republic of Panama.

Section 2 ratifies and confirms all previous acts of the President in building the canal and in governing the zone.

Section 3 authorizes the President to extinguish all adverse property titles in the zone.

Section 4 authorizes the President at any time to discontinue the temporary organization by abolishing the Isthmian Canal Commission and form a permanent organization, under a civil governor, with powers and duties to be prescribed by the President.

Section 6 provides for the installation of wireless telegraphy and the establishment of dry docks, wharves, coal supplies, repairs, and facilities for maintaining and operating the canal, all of which are to be handled by the Government.

Sections 7, 8, and 9 provide for the judicial establishment, including trial by jury in all criminal cases above a misdemeanor.

Section 10 provides for the exclusion from the Canal Zone, except under permit of the governor, of all persons not in the employ of the United States.

Section 12 provides for the extradition of fugitives from justice.

Section 13 provides for military control of the canal during the imminence or existence of war in which the United States is engaged.

There were no material differences of opinion in the committee upon any of these sections, and as the committee is unanimous in its support of these sections as they now stand, any controversy over them will be minor. I am not clear as to the policy of excluding all save officials and employees of the United States from the Canal Zone, but as half of it will be under water and nearly all of the remainder is a worthless jungle, it is a matter of small moment.

Section 5 fixes the tolls through the canal, and section 11 excludes from the canal water lines owned or controlled by competing railroads, and these are the two sections which have developed marked differences of opinion and policy.

RAILROAD-OWNED WATER LINES.

Section 11 of the pending act, by amending the interstate-commerce law, forbids railroad ownership or control of competing water carriers, which provision necessarily includes the Panama Canal, since the isthmian waterway will be a competitor of the transcontinental railroads.

Having actively supported section 5 of the pending bill, providing for the levying of uniform tolls upon all vessels, foreign and domestic, which provision is vigorously combated by certain coast cities, and particularly on the Pacific, I have felt disposed to permit the advocates of free tolls to write section 11.

DEMANDS OF THE SHIPPING INTERESTS.

But while acquiescing in this demand of the representatives of the Pacific coast—and it is principally confined to the three coast States of California, Oregon, and Washington—I must observe that a survey of the demands of the friends of the water carriers in the domestic trade acquits these interests of anything in the nature of undue modesty. Indeed, a survey of these demands, coupled with the advantages already secured to domestic water carriers by law, may well raise the question whether water transportation is a business or a charity.

Under the coastwise laws domestic shipping is given an absolute monopoly of the transportation of persons and property between American ports. When the Panama Canal is completed none but an American vessel may transport passengers and freight through it from one coast of the United States to the other, in addition to which absolute and exclusive monopoly domestic shipping now asks a free shipway through the Panama Canal and the exclusion from the canal of domestic vessels owned or controlled by competing railways. I shall show later that every boat line in the coastwise trade occupies its own exclusive water route termini and traffic territory, without either competition or supervision, and that there will be substantially no competition among water carriers through the Panama Canal, but I summarize now these demands of the coast cities, and particularly of the Pacific coast, in order that you may see at a glance their sweeping scope and character and more carefully sift the justice of these demands.

Absolute protection against foreign shipping is already secured by law to the domestic water traffic. Absolute protection against railroad owned or controlled water carriers is proposed in the pending law. On the other hand, lack of law likewise guarantees domestic shipping freedom from Government supervision or control. Given these three unqualified and extraordinary advantages, one might be led to think that there would exist sufficient inducement and opportunity to establish and maintain coast to coast traffic through the Panama Canal, but it appears that the conditions precedent to such consummation will not be completely established until in addition domestic shipping may pass through the canal without paying even the expense of lifting the vessel from sea to sea.

UNIFORM FAILURE OF PROHIBITORY LEGISLATION.

I will dismiss the railroad problem for the present with these observations: There are two principles for the Government of commercial and industrial agencies, to wit, prevention and regulation. I do not hesitate to take my stand squarely upon the side of regulation. The history of preventive legislation in the United States has been a history of failure. So far as securing benefits to the people are concerned this method has been as barren of results as the sands of the Sahara. The tale of preventive legislation is told in the Northern Securities merger case, in the dissolution of the Standard Oil and Tobacco Trusts, in the whole history of the Sherman anti-trust law, which is a history of paper victories. By reading the law and the decrees you read the death of trusts and monopolies, but you will turn away from the printed page and look in vain for a single substantial benefit from any such law upon the statute books of this country or any decision under it. But the Sherman anti-trust law is not any more barren of real results than will be the proposed railroad provision in the Panama Canal act.

Both Federal and State laws in this country absolutely forbid and enforce the prohibition against joint or interlocking ownership or control of competing railways. The objects to be attained by this prohibition are competition in service and competition in rates, but, in the final analysis, competition in rates, since the saving in money is the sum of the benefits to the shipper and consumer. The utter failure of this prohibition of joint or interlocking ownership or control to secure this ultimate object led to Federal supervision and control of interstate railways. We still enforce the law against mergers and pooling, but without any results whatever in the shape of competition. There is no law to prevent one transcontinental railroad from hauling freight at a less rate than another, but you may start a car of freight from New York for San Francisco, and it makes no difference what route is taken, or linking of routes, or whether it skirts Canada or the Gulf, or goes straight across the continent, the rate upon every road will be absolutely the same to a cent to its destination on the Pacific coast; and it makes no difference whether the traffic originates in Boston or New York, or Philadelphia, or Baltimore, or Washington, or Charleston, or Atlanta, or New Orleans, or St. Louis, or Chicago, or Kansas City, or Omaha, or Denver, and terminates in Tacoma, or Seattle, or San Francisco, or Los Angeles. The rate will be the same to a cent from any of these points of origin to any of these points of destination.

These are facts which can not be gainsaid, and I shall leave them without further comment until I come to present the facts which will as conclusively demonstrate that there will be no more competition among water carriers through the canal than there is among transcontinenal railroads, and upon which I shall predicate the argument that there will be no competition between the rail and water carriers. I prove that there is no rail competition. I prove that there will be no water competition; and I shall argue from these and other facts that there will be no competition between rail and water. But if Congress, in shirking the task it must eventually undertake of regulating domestic traffic and rates, sees fit to cripple and limit transportation through the Isthmian Canal to gratify certain coast cities which hope to benefit hereby, I shall have no quarrel with the proposition. I voted in committee for the provision as it stands in the law, and I shall vote for it in the House. We want the lowest rates the traffic will bear through the Panama Canal, and in the absence of any practical system or method to secure this result I am willing to vote for a provision that is at least a declaration of intention.

I shall now proceed to the consideration of that proposition, which is the sine qua non of domestic shipping, that without which, according to their allegations, not their proof, the Panama Canal can not be a success as a factor in domestic commerce—the question of free or preferential tolls.

Section 5 of the pending bill provides that the toll shall not exceed $1.25 per ton based upon net registered tonnage, nor be less than the cost of maintenance and operation of the canal, and that no preference shall be given or discrimination shown to the vessels of any nation, its citizens or subjects, except vessels owned by the Governments of the United States and Panama. A minority of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce have submitted a report in favor of free passage to American shipping through the Panama Canal.

This question was given exhaustive hearings by the committee; indeed, the gentlemen signing the minority report, which is nonpartisan, being signed by three Democrats and two Republicans, will join the majority of the committee in saying that no interest desiring to be heard was denied the privilege or curtailed in its exercise. In discussing this question I shall not place the burden upon the proponents of free tolls, but shall assume and undertake to show, not upon the reports filed, but upon the facts developed in the hearings, that the very right of this controversy is with the provisions of the pending bill.

MAY WE GRANT FREE TOLLS TO DOMESTIC SHIPPING WITHOUT VIOLATING TREATY RIGHTS?

At the very outset of the question of giving preferences or showing discriminations in favor of domestic shipping has been raised the point whether we may do so without violating the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, entered into between the United States and England prior and preliminary to the taking over and building of the Panama Canal by this Government. The controversy on this point arises out of the construction of section 1, article 3, of the treaty, which reads as follows:

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

This provision is construed by some members of the committee to forbid the granting of preferences or showing of discrimination to American shipping, either domestic or foreign, either by granting free or preferential tolls or rebates.

I want to say this, Mr. Chairman: That while I am with the majority upon the proposition that the Panama Canal tolls shall be uniform and universal, that there shall be no exceptions in favor of domestic shipping, yet I do not, as some of the majority Members do, base my position upon the proposition that this Government may not, if it sees fit so to do, discriminate in favor of domestic shipping. [Applause.]

I have given this question some thought, but not much study or research, but from the thought I have given it and upon principle I am not inclined to take the position that we may not grant preferences to American domestic shipping or rebates to American foreign shipping. I distinguish between the right and the policy involved. I may not consider it necessary or sufficiently beneficial to grant a free waterway to American domestic shipping or rebate of tolls to American foreign shipping, but it does not follow that I would deny my right so to do. Further than that, I am of the opinion that we have a distinct and unquestionable right to deal with our domestic shipping through the Panama Canal as we may see fit and to rebate tolls and all other charges to our foreign shipping without any violation whatsoever of treaty rights.

I listened to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] this afternoon with great attention as he discussed the treaty. Not only is he a very able man, but a man who is peculiarly well qualified to discuss the particular question that he did discuss. I do not believe that there is any abler man or one better qualified on the committee or in either body to discuss that particular question than the gentleman from Minnesota.

And yet I propose to say this: That even if it was a question of doubt whether we could discriminate in favor of American shipping, as some claimed it to be whether we could fortify, I do not believe the American people would take kindly to the view that we could not. I fear that the view that our hands are thus tied by that treaty would not accord with the spirit and the sentiment with respect to this matter that are entertained by the people of this country. [Applause.] So I prefer, Mr. Chairman, to base my opposition to free tolls entirely upon other grounds.

I will admit that I have not made a deep research into that aspect of the question. I will admit that my views are rather the result of random thinking than of research. But it has occurred to me from the start that, so far as domestic shipping was concerned, this situation was analogous to that known in law as damnum absque injuria if, indeed, the rights and claims of foreign nations, if they have any rights and claims, rise to the dignity of that doctrine of damage without injury, of damage for which the injured party has no standing for redress. The shipping of other nations is absolutely excluded from the coastwise trade. The shipping of other nations can not participate in it, and I have been at a loss to understand substantially, laying aside all refinements of reasoning, how they could be heard to complain about a matter in which they have no rights or interests whatsoever.

OUR STATUS DUAL—SOVEREIGN AND PROPRIETARY.

But I want to make a suggestion at this point that I believe is new to this debate. There may be nothing in it. It applies to both sides of this controversy. It is is: That I believe in the minds of most, if not all, of us there is a confusion—and I will say that the idea is so new to me that it is not yet fully formulated in my own mind. There is a confusion as to our status over the canal; there is a confusion as to the status and capacity of this Government with relation to the canal.

The debates indicate that gentlemen look at that work in every aspect from the standpoint of government, from the standpoint of the exercise of sovereignty; whereas I believe, and I venture to think, it will be so determined in the future that our principal relationship to the Panama Canal is one of proprietorship and not of sovereignty.

TOLLS NOT A TAX.

One of the objections with which we were met at the very outset of this controversy was that this was the first instance in American history in which a tax was levied upon interstate commerce. Gentlemen from the Pacific coast made that claim. I have the language from the hearings of the Commissioner of Navigation, who seems to be the evangel of free tolls, that this is the first attempt to levy a tax upon interstate commerce. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, this is not the levy of a tax on interstate commerce at all. This Government is not, in its sovereign capacity as a Government, levying any tax whatever upon commerce through the Panama Canal, and I have had one of the best attorneys, in my judgment one of the most competent men in the United States, who has investigated this subject, and who is utterly opposed to my views with reference to the payment of tolls, admit that I am right on the proposition that this is not a tax by a sovereign but a charge by a proprietor for the use of the Panama Canal.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman permit a question right on that point?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I will.

Mr. HARDY. Would there be any difference in principle between asking the Government to carry freight along the Isthmian Railway free of charge and asking the Government to carry it along its canal free of charge? Is not the principle just the same? In other words, it is a charge for a service performed.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. So far as it occurs to my mind at this time, there is no difference in principle.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Would not that same argument apply to traffic on the Mississippi River, or on the Columbia River, or any other river where money is appropriated to make the navigation easy?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. For reasons that I am not going into at this time in this discussion, I propose to deny that suggestion, and take the position that the Panama Canal stands absolutely without parallel in the history and experience of the world. It must be dealt with upon its merits and not by analogy with some proposition like dredging a river.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman allow me just briefly to answer the statement of the gentleman from Oregon?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I am very sorry, but I have only 30 minutes.

Mr. HARDY. I realize that.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. To resume where I left off, if I can, the levying of tolls for the passage of ships through the Panama Canal is the charge of a proprietor for the use of an instrumentality owned in a proprietary manner and not the levying of a tax by a sovereign.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield right there for a question?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I will.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman explain what is in his mind as to the difference between sovereignty over what the United States owns and its proprietorship of what it owns? The gentleman draws a distinction.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. I should like to have the gentleman explain that.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I think if our ownership and operation of the Panama Canal and the fixing of rules and regulations were sovereign instead of proprietary, then we would be bound to charge the vessels of all nations alike; but we own that canal. We are building it; we are paying the cost of building it; we are going to pay the cost of operation. We will stand all losses, if any, and all the burden of total failure, if that shall result. If we want to go into our own pockets as a proprietor and pay the charges for the passage of certain boats through that canal, that is our loss. So I base our right to charge tolls or to exempt from tolls upon our proprietary status, just the same as the private company that owns and operates the Suez Canal can permit the vessels of nations to go through upon which the tolls are rebated or as a private company could do at Panama had a private company constructed the canal, without any complaint from the nations which rebate no tolls at all. That does not furnish any ground for complaint that the Suez Canal is violating the terms of equality and neutrality agreed upon by the nations in the convention of Constantinople.

Mr. SULZER. Will the gentleman answer this question: If the Government of the United States has not sovereign rights over the Panama Canal, what Government on earth has?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. We have sovereign rights over it. Our capacity down there is dual. We are protecting the Panama Canal and guaranteeing its neutrality and equality as a sovereign, as a Government, but we are operating it as a proprietor, just the same as a private company would. We were authorized under the treaty to have it built by a private company. Supposing that under that treaty we had had the Panama Canal constructed by a private company, the same as the Suez Canal was constructed. Will any gentleman claim that it could not have run its own boats through there free of charge, or, which is the same thing, rebated the tolls to them? Will any gentleman claim that it could not have run the boats of nations through there which rebated all the tolls or half the tolls or none of the tolls, just as is being done in the case of the Suez Canal?

IDENTITY OF SUEZ AND PANAMA TREATY PROVISIONS.

Then again, this treaty provision embodies the substance of the convention of Constantinople, governing the terms and conditions of the operation of the Suez Canal, the signatories to which convention are as follows: Great Britain, Germany, Austria-Hungary, Spain, France, Italy, the Netherlands, Russia, and Turkey.

One of these signatories, Russia, appropriates directly for the repayment of Suez charges to Russian vessels; another, Austria, appropriates for the repayment of certain Austrian lines; and all of the signatories have subsidized lines running through the Suez Canal. Some of them, however, as in the case of England, subsidize only their mail lines, leaving the freight lines to pay tolls without reimbursement. Yet England, for instance, with her unsubsidized freight lines, does not complain that Russia or Austria are permitted to repay all tolls through the Suez Canal. Indeed, in the case of England, which is the principal stockholder in the Suez Canal and owning nearly one-half of such stock, it may be doubted whether its mail subsidies have any reference whatever to the payment of Suez Canal tolls. England subsidizes her mail lines whether they use the Suez Canal or not. The fact remains, according to the American Commissioner of Navigation, that some of the signatories to the convention of Constantinople rebate all of the tolls through the Suez Canal; others rebate in part, while in the case of still others it is not shown what is done; yet no complaint is heard that the canal company is not enforcing equality of terms in its usage. If a nation wishes to repay charges against the vessels of its citizens in whole or in part, that is the business of the nation, and every other nation may do the same thing; and that is equality of terms. If there is an American ship line between New York and the Orient and this Government wishes to rebate the Panama Canal charges and does rebate them, it is doing neither more nor less than England may do with an English boat line through the canal to the Orient or than France or Germay or any other nation may do with the boat lines of its citizens or subjects. These would be terms of entire equality, involving no discrimination in respect of the conditions or charges.

In this connection, and reasoning by analogy, it must be borne in mind that the treaty says that "the canal shall be free and open." Now, no Member will take the position that this means free of tolls or other just charges. This, like all other provisions, merely means that the canal shall be open to transit by the vessels of the nations of the world, and open to them upon terms of equality with all other nations; and the meaning for which I contend is that given by the signatories of the convention of Constantinople to the first paragraph of that agreement, which reads as follows:

ARTICLE 1. The Suez Maritime Canal shall always be free and open, in time of war as in time of peace, to every vessel of commerce or of war, without distinction of flag.

My position, therefore, with reference to this preliminary provision is that we may do as we please with reference to our domestic shipping, and that we may reimburse our foreign shipping; and I do not believe that this construction of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty would ever be questioned by the other signatory, the Government of England, or by any other nation; and I prefer to stand on the proposition that the treaty was entered into by Great Britain with full knowledge and acceptance of the conditions with respect to our domestic water traffic and with respect to the practices under the Suez treaty.

TREATY RIGHTS NOT DETERMINED BY PENDING ACT.

But I can not linger on this subject, and I am not a sufficient authority, and it makes but little difference whether I am right or wrong, but I believe that I have suggested an idea, dimly formed in my mind, which will take form in abler minds interested in the subject and determine some of these questions now in controversy.

I shall dismiss this point by quoting from the report filed by Mr. ADAMSON, the chairman of the committee:

While many members of our committee believe that by the terms of our treaties with Great Britain we are prevented from allowing preferential or free tolls to ships of American registry, either coastwise or foreign, the majority of the committee voting for uniform tolls authorize and request the statement, positive, plain, and unequivocal, that no language of this section was chosen or used for the purpose of foreclosing discussion and differing opinions on that question. They authorize the express affirmation that this provision is adopted for present use, disclaiming all intention to declare in this section any construction of the language of the treaty or to establish any precedent or permanent legislative policy or to bind any future Congress should it be deemed expedient or adjudged competent to adopt a different basis.

Thus showing that the majority have expressly disclaimed passing upon the rights of the United States on this subject under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. BROUSSARD. In at least three different acts of Congress the Mississippi River has been declared to be a highway—the act by which Louisiana drafted her constitution, the act by which she was admitted into the Union of States, and a subsequent act creating the Territory of Missouri. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman if the argument he makes in regard to the canal, in view of these acts of Congress, if the same rule could not be made applicable to the Mississippi River?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The gentleman knows that the United States does not own the Mississippi River, nor a drop of water in it.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I do not know any such thing.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The United States only exercises the right to preserve and protect navigation in these navigable rivers, and has no proprietary rights in them whatever.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I disagree with the gentleman.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The United States owns the Panama Canal. It is making a river where God Almighty did not make any. And this river will cost so much to make and maintain it, the United States may, as a matter of business policy, when there is no substantial reason to the contrary, levy some moderate charge for the use of it and to pay a part of the enormous cost of its upkeep. In other words, the principle in this case is exactly the same as it is in the case of charging for the use of the Eads Bridge at St. Louis. Is that a tax on interstate commerce? Is there any difference in principle in getting a train from land to land and in getting a boat from water to water? There is no more exercise of sovereign power involved in these canal tolls than there is in the rules of the Eads Bridge Co. in charging railway trains for getting across the Mississippi River. The Panama Canal is not a natural waterway any more than is the Hudson tunnel a natural roadway. It is and ever will be a very costly artificial waterway. That we can mix sense with sentiment and by charging only a tithe of the vast saving it will effect to water transportation and without restricting or crippling that transportation, either domestic or foreign, I shall undertake to show.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Yes; make it short.

Mr. LAFFERTY. In regard to the locks built up in the navigable rivers of the United States, the United States is proprietor of the locks and charges no tolls.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Perhaps at some time they may.

Mr. LAFFERTY. And yet the gentleman has introduced a bill which is entirely revolutionary in that matter.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The Government has been putting millions of dollars into one of these rivers for the benefit of the Anthracite Coal Trust fleets.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Is not the gentleman's argument based upon a new and revolutionary bill which he has introduced here?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. No, sir; that has nothing to do in this case. I am not influenced by that in the least; and I want to say that there is no man that has given any consideration whatever to this legislation who is any more heartily in favor of the Panama Canal than I am myself. I claim to be a simon-pure Panamaniac on this subject, and I want the canal to be a grand success from every standpoint—navigation, traffic, and everything else.

Mr. Chairman, I am sorry to say that if I had stuck to my text I might have succeeded in making some more definite contribution to this discussion, and if the Chair will indulge me for 10 or 15 minutes longer time than was allotted to me I will promise to stick to the text and say something that has not been said in this debate but has a direct bearing upon these issues and will have a bearing on the information of Members concerning it.

Mr. CLINE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. CLINE. Suppose it had been constructed by an individual or a corporation, would not the treaty of 1901—the Hay-Pauncefote treaty—operate as an organic law for the operation of the canal?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Yes; the same as it would by the Government. And in that case who will say that the private company would be required to pass domestic shipping free; and would domestic shipping ask such a thing?

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to direct attention to the Suez Canal——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have 5 or 10 minutes more.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman from Colorado is himself a party to the agreement that we have already made.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I will admit that my arrangement to leave town renders it my own fault that I do not get more time, but I would like 5 minutes more.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman from Indiana takes the same boat that the gentleman from Colorado is to take, and I have agreed to yield to him 30 minutes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Can I have 5 minutes?

Mr. ADAMSON. That would be 35 minutes, if I should give the gentleman from Colorado 5 minutes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Just give me five minutes more in order that I may outline what I expect to prove.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I want to say this. There were a number of gentlemen representing ship interests who appeared before the Interstate Commerce Committee, some of whom advocated free tolls as a necessity, and some of whom said they would accept them as a donation, if given; but. I want to say that not one single person who appeared before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce could sustain any one of the following three propositions:

First. That free tolls were necessary to furnish the Panama Canal with shipping facilities.

Second. That free tolls were necessary to enable shipping through the Panama Canal to strongly and effectually compete with the transcontinental railways; or,

Third. That free tolls to domestic shipping through the Panama Canal would even tend to build up an American merchant marine.

If this donation to the Shipping Trust—and it was shown in the hearings that the ship owners had a trust that ought to make the Railroad Trust green with envy—will not accomplish either one of those three things, what in the name of common sense is to be accomplished by free tolls through the Panama Canal? It was testified even by the Commissioner of Navigation—and I shall set out his testimony in full in the RECORD—that there is to-day one existing company, the American-Hawaiian Co., that has shipping facilities in excess of the Panama Canal traffic, that if the Panama Canal were to be thrown open to-morrow this one company has more ships than there would be traffic for in the canal, and in addition to that they are building five more big ships.

Mr. MANN. What is the company building them for?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Because there is a presumption that the traffic will enlarge by the time the Panama Canal is open, that there will then be a sufficient traffic for the new vessels, and further, of course, that the canal is going to create traffic. But in addition to that, there are about 200 more vessels in the coastwise trade, a large number of which are of sufficient capacity to use the Panama Canal, and I will say again, in answer to the gentleman from Illinois, that notwithstanding I voted for section 11 of the bill, I do not believe in it. I believe that it is utterly ineffective. I do not believe you are going to get competition in rates through the Panama Canal, by means of this section, by shutting out railroad-owned boats, because all of the preventive legislation that has ever been passed in the history of this Nation has been a failure. I believe the true remedy is regulation. It does not matter who puts the boats in there, let them put them in there just as we let people put capital into the building of railroads, and then regulate them as we do the railroads, and until that is done I make the prediction that all of the prohibitions that you can write into the statutes of the United States will absolutely fail to secure the very thing you are striving to secure, namely, competition.

And I am glad to be in such distinguished company on this proposition as Dr. Emory R. Johnson, the expert appointed by the President to study canal traffic and tolls, as shown by the following dialogue between Dr. Johnson and the gentleman from California [Mr. KNOWLAND], who says that the coast people are, consistently enough, opposed to regulation of water traffic as in the case of the railroads:

SHIPPING INTERESTS OPPOSED TO REGULATION.

Dr. JOHNSON. This raises the question of the importance of the regulation of coastwise transportation between our two seaboards, and suggests to my mind the wisdom of the policy of regulation instead of the policy of artificial restriction of the use of the canal.

Mr. KNOWLAND. What do you mean by that?

Dr. JOHNSON. I mean that I would allow all ships to go through under equal conditions, and I would have such regulations as would insure the equal and free use, under fair terms, of the canal by all ships, whatever the owners.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Do you mean by that you would put them under the interstate-commerce act?

Dr. JOHNSON. That would be the logical thing to do; yes.

Mr. KNOWLAND. The very thing our people oppose on the coast.

Dr. JOHNSON. There is opposition to that?

Mr. KNOWLAND. Yes; by the very people who complain against the control of the canal coastwise traffic by railroad-owned lines; the contention being that if placed under the interstate-commerce act, there will be less competition; that rates will be fixed which all lines will adopt, and that there will be practically no competition where there should be on such an open highway.

Dr. JOHNSON. That raises a large question, Mr. KNOWLAND. My fear is that, inasmuch as most of the traffic between our two seaboards (to limit discussion to that) will be handled by lines of vessels, with the exception of eastbound cargoes of lumber, the rates of the several steamship lines will be fixed by conferences more or less formal, and that the necessity for the Government regulation of rates to prevent unreasonably high rates will be found to be evident.

That Dr. Johnson's fear is well founded is shown by the fact that we now have no competition in either coastwise or foreign trade. Certainly when the law of the land can not enforce competition between rail carriers, but must regulate them, it would appear futile to hope that lack of law on the sea would result in better conditions between water carriers.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman why he voted for that proposition if he does not believe in it?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I will say this: I voted for that proposition because these modest gentlemen representing the water lines have now an absolute and exclusive monopoly of the domestic shipping—the coast-to-coast trade—given them by law, and in addition to that they want free tolls through the Panama Canal and the exclusion of every boat that is owned and controlled, in whole or in part, by a railroad. Having beaten them on the question of free tolls, I yielded to them on the other, weakly, perhaps, to show that I was not influenced in my position on tolls out of consideration for the railroads, and I believe other gentlemen did the same.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman one question. On the theory that one good turn deserves another, ought not the enjoyment of one discrimination to deserve another? [Laughter.]

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. That seems to be the theory of the minority of the committee, I will say to the distinguished gentleman from Georgia.

THE SUEZ AS A GUIDE.

While the Suez Canal has cost to date only about one-third of what will be the total initial cost of the Panama Canal, it will be extremely profitable to briefly review the experience of the Suez, which has performed the same function of severing the continents and uniting the seas in the eastern world that will be performed by the Panama Canal in the western world. From my study of this question, I believe the president of the Suez Canal has said truly that these two canals will complement rather than compete with each other, and the history of the one, which is a history of tremendous success, can not fail to shed much light upon what may be reasonably predicated of the other, whose operation is not yet begun.

THE SUEZ A GREAT BUSINESS SUCCESS.

The most thorough presentation of the case for free tolls that has been made is to be found in the annual report of the Commissioner of Navigation for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1911. This report also contains much valuable information about the Suez Canal. It shows, among other things, the annual net tonnage and annual receipts of the Suez Canal from the beginning, from which it appears there has been a steady growth in both tonnage and receipts, the tonnage having increased from 6,576 in 1869 to 16,581,898 in 1910, while the receipts in francs from ship tolls increased from 54,460 in 1869 to 130,436,547 in 1910.

I shall insert at this point the table to which I have referred. (Hearings, p. 815):

Yearly return of shipping and tonnage that passed through the Suez Canal from its opening until the year 1910, together with the transit receipts.

Beginning with 1881 as a period, it will be seen that while the traffic of the Suez Canal during the past 30 years has increased just exactly fourfold, the receipts from tolls have increased considerably less than threefold. This failure of receipts to maintain a proportionate increase with tonnage, coupled with the enormous profits of the Suez Canal, to which I will next refer, contain a valuable reason as to what may be expected of the Panama Canal with a rate of tolls so moderate as not to affect at all the volume of its traffic and will not increase to the consumer the cost of goods thus transported, except, as I shall prove, to the extent to which the shipper may voluntarily share with the consumer the sum of 2 cents or less per 100 pounds of freight, and the consumer to whom such a saving would be an object will not be an ultimate consumer, but a middleman well equipped for the absorption of such portion of the toll as the shipping interests may voluntarily pass on to him.

PROFITS OF THE SUEZ CANAL.

The foregoing table of the annual traffic and receipts of the Suez Canal does not alone tell the story of its great success. Perhaps that success can be shown in no more striking and significant manner than by calling attention to the fact, as shown on page 228 of the commissioner's report, that the receipts from ship tolls in the Suez Canal for the year 1898—hearings, page 814—were 82,657,421 francs; while on page 224 of the report it is shown that the profits available for distribution for the year 1910 were 82,427,042 francs; in other words, that the profit available for distribution in 1910 was practically the same as the total receipts in 1908.

I have found it not only a saving of labor, but in some instances instructive to quote copiously from the hearings upon the subject of tolls, and if it shall appear that a disproportionate number of the statements quoted were in answer to questions propounded by myself, I may explain by saying that I took an especial interest in this feature of the canal legislation.

A brief but very instructive colloquy bearing upon the great success and profitable character of the Suez enterprise is to be found in the hearings—pages 812–813—and I shall insert the same at this point in my remarks. It shows that up to and including the year 1910 the total cost of constructing and improving the Suez Canal was approximately $131,000,000, while the profit for distribution for the year 1910 alone exceeded $16,000,000. This was not only a dividend of 12 per cent upon the entire investment in the Suez Canal from the beginning, but it was a dividend of 31 per cent upon the capital stock of the Suez Canal; and this notwithstanding the fact that the Suez Canal tolls have been reduced just one-third since 1884.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The Suez Canal has been a very profitable enterprise?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Of late years; originally it was not. If you will look at that same statement to which I was referring (Table 2, upper right-hand column) you will notice that in 1867 to 1868 the company had to issue a large number of bonds; that was to complete the canal. In 1871, 1880, and 1887 they made other loans. Those loans of 1880 and 1887 were rather in the nature of improvements. The earlier ones were to make the thing go at all.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Of course, I am referring to the canal since it was completed. It has been a tremendously profitable enterprise, as I indicated, for instance, by the figures in the upper left-hand column of Table 2, showing that the total investment up to the close of the year 1910 was approximately 656,178,000 francs, or approximately $131,000,000. Last year the profit for distribution, for the fiscal year ending December 31, 1910, was 88,000,000 francs, or in round numbers $16,000,000. Now, that was a dividend, as you see, of 31 per cent——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is 158 francs on a 500-franc share.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. A dividend of 31 per cent on the capital stock, but it would also be a dividend of about 12 per cent on the entire investment, including the construction, improvement, and so forth, of the canal. Now, another indication of great success on the part of the canal is that whereas it had for the year 1881 a net transit tonnage of about 4,000,000 net tons, in 1910 it had 16,500,000, and it shows almost without exception a constant and rapid increase of tonnage. This, I think, establishes the fact that the Suez Canal has been and is a very profitable institution, notwithstanding the fact that only beginning with January 1, 1912, the present month, it has reduced its tolls to what would be $1.30 in American money, but which under the system of ship measurement in all other parts of the world would amount to $1.50. That is a fair statement of the entire case.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is, I think, an admirable statement. I think that is one of the matters which it is very important for this committee to bear in mind, that any time the administration of the Suez Canal wishes to reduce those tolls it could cut them down. You can figure it out for yourselves. They could cut it down to a great deal less than the current rate, even to a dollar, on a ton basis, and still pay what in this country would be regarded as a very fair dividend.

The Suez Canal, it may be explained, and as shown by the above table, began with the toll rate of 10 francs per net ton, which would be equivalent to $1.95 in American money. That rate has been gradually reduced in accordance with the charter provisions of the company until on January 1 of this year, to which time the table does not reach, it was placed at 6¾ francs, the equivalent in American money of $1.30½. The committee received exhaustive instruction upon the question of the different methods of measuring ships. The net ton is the universal rule of measuring ships of commerce for the purpose of tolls, tonnage dues, and such charges. The principal variations in this system are due to the different practices in making deductions of certain spaces in the ship. I can not take the time of the committee to explain or discuss gross tonnage, net-weight tonnage, dead-weight tonnage, and displacement tonnage, but I shall insert at this point in my remarks the essential parts of a brief explanation furnished the committee by Capt. Charles A. McAllister, engineer in chief of the Revenue-Cutter Service:

TONNAGE DEFINITIONS.

There are two kinds of tons—vessel tons and cargo tons. Each of these two kinds of tons is used with several different meanings.

VESSEL TONNAGE.

Vessel tonnage is of four kinds—displacement, gross register, net register, and dead-weight capacity.

The displacement tonnage of a vessel is its weight in tons of 2,240 pounds and is equal to the weight of water displaced by the ship when floating. From the plans and drawings required for the construction of a vessel may be determined the number of cubic feet of water which the ship will displace at any given draft. The weight of a cubic foot of water being known, the displacement tonnage is thus readily determined. Displacement tonnage is used to designate the size of war vessels, but is not employed in merchant shipping.

A register ton is a purely arbitrary unit—100 cubic feet. The gross register tonnage of a vessel is obtained by dividing by 100 the number of cubic feet of the entire closed-in capacity of the ship. A vessel has 1 gross ton for each 100 cubic feet of its entire capacity.

To determine the net register tonnage of a vessel, there is deducted from the entire capacity of the hull the space occupied by the crew, master's cabin, steering and anchor gear below deck, boatswain's stores, chart house, and spaces occupied by propelling power (engines, boilers, shaft tunnel, fixed coal bunkers). These deductions having been made, the net register tonnage is ascertained by dividing the number of cubic feet in the remaining space by 100. In an up-to-date freight steamer, as measured by British, American, or German rules, the net register is somewhat less than two-thirds the gross register. In the case of a high-speed passenger vessel, so much of the capacity of the ship is taken up with propelling machinery, fixed coal bunkers, crew space, etc., that the net register tonnage may be less than half, sometimes not more than one-third, of the gross register.

The dead-weight tonnage of a vessel is the number of tons of 2,240 pounds that the vessel is capable of carrying when loaded to its maximum draft.

Ordinarily the dead-weight tonnage is from 2¾ to 2¾ times the net register tonnage.

CARGO TONNAGE.

The cargo ton is of two classes—weight and measurement. The weight ton employed in ocean commerce is either the English long ton, of 2,240 pounds, or the metric ton, of 2,204.62 pounds.

A large share of the cargo carried by ocean vessels is shipped not by weight but by measurement tonnage, 40 cubic feet being considered a ton. In the statistics of ocean freight both the long ton of 2,240 pounds and the measurement ton of 40 cubic feet are indiscriminately included, and thus it is not possible to ascertain from published statistics of ocean cargo tonnage the actual weight of traffic moved upon the high seas.

The President is authorized by the bill to adopt any system of measurement he may see fit; but, excepting war vessels, which will be charged for on the basis of displacement tonnage, he will adopt the universal rule for ships of commerce, which is known interchangeably as net tonnage or net register tonnage. The Suez Canal, by making scant deductions of the ship spaces which are subtracted from the gross tonnage in order to ascertain the net tonnage, produces about 20 per cent more net tonnage than does the English or American systems. For this reason the present rate of $1.30 per net ton through the Suez would be equivalent to $1.60 through the Panama Canal. When it is borne in mind that the maximum will be $1.25, which, applied to the different methods of tonnage measurement, will govern the two canals, it will be seen to be equivalent to a rate of $1 through the Suez Canal. It will necessarily be some years before the Suez Canal reduces to the rate at which the Panama Canal will begin; and if the Panama Canal begins, as I hope it will, with a rate of $1, it is not likely that it will ever be met by the Suez.

NATURAL MONOPOLY OF THE SUEZ.

A brief, but comprehensive and admirable, table furnished by Commissioner Chamberlin indicates, however, that the Suez has a natural monopoly over the majority of the traffic it now transits, which can not be taken from it by the comparatively slight difference in rates, even though the Panama rate is fixed at $1, and it can not very well be less. This table covers a period of 20 years, and shows, in connection with the explanatory colloquy following it, that the Suez Canal has a natural and undeniable monopoly of more than one-half of its present traffic and probably two-thirds of that traffic:

PANAMA ZONE.

A course of instruction in the geography of the world from the standpoint of navigation and ship commerce under the tutelage of such men as Commissioner of Navigation Chamberlain and Prof. Emory R. Johnson, of the University of Pennsylvania, who was detailed by President Taft to make a survey of all ocean traffic with relation to the Panama Canal, and who, with Mr. Chamberlain, presented this matter exhaustively to the Interstate Commerce Committee—such a course of instruction, I repeat, is disappointing to the Panama enthusiast. The Pacific Ocean is a huge body of water, and it is a great distance across it to the lands upon and beyond its western shores and even to the islands within its western waters.

According to the statements of Dr. Johnson, all of Australia, New Zealand, the Philippines, India, and China—indeed, all of the Eastern Hemisphere—are closer to all European ports by the Suez than by the Panama route. This, of course, means that traffic from all European ports to all Asiatic ports will find the Suez the shorter route. The only natural monopoly of the Panama Canal will be that which the Atlantic coast will enjoy over the western coast of the American Continent, from Alaska on the north to Chile on the south. Even the Pacific coast of the United States will derive no advantages whatever with respect to Atlantic South American ports by reason of the Panama Canal, since the ports on the northern coast of South America, the coasts of the Guianas and Venezuela, are closer to Plymouth than to San Francisco.

TOLLS UPON DOMESTIC SHIPPING.

It is not my purpose to go into the question of foreign Panama Canal traffic, whether in American or foreign bottoms. It is my purpose to devote myself principally to tolls upon domestic shipping traffic. But I have deemed it beneficial to an understanding of the smaller question to which I shall address myself, to take a glance at the canal in its larger aspects and relations to the water traffic of the world. With this observation I shall return to the question of domestic tolls, and first to the testimony of the Commissioner of Navigation with relation thereto.

The report of the Commissioner of Navigation contains a number of statements in substance and effect that not only are free tolls through the Panama Canal necessary to furnish it with domestic shipping, but the commissioner even went so far as to say that free tolls were necessary to preserve American shipbuilding and the coastwise trade. During the hearings I quoted some of these statements to the commissioner and requested him to state the facts upon which he based his conclusions. That Mr. Chamberlain did not sustain either his contentions as to the necessity or the benefits of free tolls, or that free tolls were necessary to the preservation of the coastwise trade, I may safely leave to be drawn from his answers. On page 8 of his report the commissioner said:

A deliberate conclusion to tax directly American shipping to pay for the maintenance of that canal when no tolls are imposed on vessels, American or foreign, for the use of our other improved waterways will be well-nigh inexplicable, save as the definite surrender of the ocean to others by the United States except as we may use its waters from time to time for the maneuvers of our war fleets.

On page 9 of the report the commissioner says:

The present statutory reservation of the coasting trade between Atlantic and Pacific ports to American vessels will not alone suffice to create the shipping needed for the coasting trade through the canal, for that reservation could not be regarded as longer secure in the face of a decision by Congress to select American navigation alone to bear the direct burden of supporting a canal, military in its first great purpose, and for the general welfare in its second. Only the most venturesome capital would trust itself to shipbuilding and shipowning for canal purposes.

On the same page the commissioner says:

If they (American shipping interests) are named as the sole American direct contributors to the cost of the canal, the conclusion will be inevitable that Congress has decided definitely for some years to come that shipping must shift for itself, regardless of the consideration which may be shown to other industries, for a tariff can not be framed without intentional or unintentional favors.

In connection with this particular paragraph, let it not be forgotten that the particular interest involved, to wit, American domestic shipping, is not only protected from Canadian shipping competition by the highest tariffs in the world, but is protected from competition against all the vessels of the world, Canada included, by a law that in terms prevents all foreign vessels from engaging in our domestic water traffic.

Then the commissioner, on page 22 of his report, referring to the Frye bill, which provides for the free use of the Panama Canal by American shipping, makes this statement:

Its rejection—

Meaning the Frye bill—

therefore, can be construed in no other manner than as the deliberate declaration of the purpose of the United States to abandon ocean navigation. That declaration must be followed sooner or later by opening that navigation in all its phases to foreign ships and closing American shipyards on the seaboard.

All the foregoing statements were read in conjunction to the commissioner, who was then asked to detail his reasons for making them—the facts upon which they were based. All of the colloquy going to show whether or not the commissioner sustained his position follows:

FROM THE TESTIMONY OF COMMISSIONER OF NAVIGATION IN SUPPORT OF HIS PROPOSITION THAT FREE TOLLS ARE ESSENTIAL TO DOMESTIC SHIPPING THROUGH THE PANAMA CANAL AND TO THE PRESERVATION OF AMERICAN SHIPBUILDING AND THE COASTWISE TRADE.

FIRST—TOLLS A TAX ON INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. What do you mean by the statement that if we impose tolls on American shipping through the canal even the coastwise trade can be regarded as no longer secure, following upon the statement which I read into the record that it will drive American shipyards and American shipping, even in the coastwise trade, from the high seas?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Those statements should all be joined together precisely as you have joined them. Those extracts fit in together very well.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I want the matter stated fairly from your standpoint.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is a better way of stating those propositions than the way they were placed in my report. It is better to assemble them in that way. The reason those positions were taken is: In the first place, it is, so far as I can recall, the first case where Congress in time of peace has contemplated a tax on interstate commerce. The traffic through the canal, of course, must be divided into three branches—laying aside warship navigation—commercial traffic through the canal comprises three branches. In the first place, there is domestic commerce—the commerce between our two coasts which is interstate commerce. In the second place, there is the commerce between the ports of the United States and foreign ports in either hemisphere, which is our foreign commerce. In the third place, there would be the traffic through the canal which is exclusively foreign, with which we will have nothing to do, which will constitute about one-third of it. To take up just now the coastwise commerce—that is, interstate commerce pure and simple—so far as I can recall, this is the first proposition in time of peace to impose a Federal tax on interstate commerce. In the Civil War, of course, there were a great many of such taxes imposed, and necessarily so. There were a few such taxes imposed in the Spanish War. I think there were some charges on passenger tickets, although I am not sure but those were confined——

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. You speak of canal tolls as imposing a tax on interstate commerce. I suppose you are aware of the fact that railroad companies pay for the use of Eads Bridge at St. Louis, and that there are, no doubt, other situations in which the railroad companies pay a charge, not a tax, for getting their trains across rivers and across navigable waters, bays, harbors, and so forth, under conditions that can be properly and legitimately claimed, I think, to be analogous to what we are doing down there in Panama in getting them across the land. There will be no difference in principle between getting a ship from water to water and a railroad train from land to land in interstate commerce.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No.

The CHAIRMAN. I want to call your attention, Mr. MARTIN, to the fact that the Government of the United States was willing for commerce to take this canal in order that they might use it, but commerce would not built it; money was too cowardly, or something was the matter. Finally, we had to build it. We were willing for them to build it and pay tolls on Government ships, but they would not do it.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I do not know that the chairman was here when the foundation was laid for this line of questioning, and I want to repeat briefly: The Commissioner of Navigation, who is a very responsible and high authority on this proposition—in my judgment the highest and most responsible and best qualified in the service of the Government, far above the Secretary of War or the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, with all due respect to those gentlemen; they are not experts in this line and he is—has made a report which is an exhaustive study and presentation of this whole subject and in which he has gone on to say that if we impose a toll on the coast-to-coast trade through the Panama Canal that trade can be regarded as no longer secure, and that finally American shipyards and American coastwise trade will be destroyed. I want him to explain to us just how that result will be brought about.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The first reason I have stated. I was not aware of, and I do not know exactly yet, the nature of these charges for a bridge across the Mississippi for the use of a railroad. So far as I recall, I stated that the Panama toll proposed is the first peace tax on interstate commerce of which I was aware. It seems that there is some tax for the use of a bridge.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. You would not regard it as a tax if it were by a private owner. You are assuming it to be a tax simply because the United States owns it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is a Federal tax, isn't it?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. No, sir; it is a charge by the United States as a proprietor.

SECOND—NO OTHER IMPROVEMENT CHARGED FOR.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In the second place, section 4 of the river and harbor act of July 5, 1884, provides, "No tolls or operating charges whatever shall be levied upon or collected from any vessel, dredge, or other water craft for passing through any lock, canal, canalized river, or other work for the use and benefit of navigation now belonging to the United States or that may be hereafter acquired or constructed." (Hearings, pp. 875–876.)

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. My question is, How will the Panama Canal tolls destroy the American coast-to-coast trade, which shipping has an exclusive and absolute statutory monopoly?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. My reply thus far, Mr. Chairman, has been, first, I understand that this proposed canal toll is the first peace tax on interstate commerce. My second suggestion was that it is the first instance where Congress undertook to impose, in form at least, a tax on American vessels—of course foreign vessels, too, but this discussion is confined to American vessels—for using improved waterways and canals.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand he wants you to answer a concrete question as to how the tolls will affect the shipping.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I can not get at that, Mr. Chairman, by yes or no.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I want to know how tolls are going to have that result.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I think the witness should be allowed to answer in his own way.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, as to the effect which charging tolls would have in killing American merchant marine, I would like to have the explanation how that is possible.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Let the witness answer the question in his own way.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the question now. Let us have the answer to that, please, in you own way. How will the charges of equal tolls on the canal kill American merchant marine? That is the question. I want you to answer the question in your own way.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. This is getting to resemble, if I may be allowed to make the remark, the wireless interference with which we are dealing in another committee. [Laughter.] In my opinion—and I know that all the members of the committee will not agree with me—every dollar in tolls collected from ships from one seaboard to the other—please understand that I am talking about American vessels in the coastwise trade and nothing else—every dollar that is imposed on that trade is, to the extent of that dollar, a reduction in the value of the canal as a competing transportation route with the railroads. (Hearings, p. 880.)

THIRD—WILL WEAKEN CANAL AS COMPETITOR OF RAILWAYS.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Your third reason why the tolls on American coast-to-coast shipping through the Panama Canal will destroy that business is that it will lessen or weaken the ability of our coast-to-coast shipping to compete with the transcontinental railroads. That is a fair statement? * * * The authorities seem to agree that the cost of water transportation is about one-third of that of rail transportation. They also seem to agree—and I cited to the committee in questioning these witnesses Pacific coast publications which are in harmony with you on the free-toll proposition for the coast-to-coast shipping, giving specific rate statements indicating the correctness of this proportion of cost of water to rail transportation, showing that whereas now the fruit rate from the Pacific coast to the Atlantic coast is $27.56 a ton, at which rate they ship about 1,000,000 tons annually from the Pacific coast to the Atlantic coast, that fruit can be transported by means of the Panama Canal at a cost of about $7 per ton. * * *

Now, if there is no toll charged, these shipments for which these companies now charge $27.56 a ton can be transported via the canal for about $7 a ton. The proposition seems to be clearly established, and the matter has been brought out in these hearings, that traffic can be transported by way of the Panama Railroad now for about $8 or 9 a ton. Now, admitting these statements I have made to be even approximately correct, do you take the position that in order to render the Panama Canal competitive there must be donated to the water shippers a toll amounting to about $1 per net registered ton, which would be upon the actual cargo about 40 cents a ton, there being on the average two and one-half tons of actual cargo in the net registered ton space of 100 cubic feet; about 40 cents per ton, or, resolved down to the lowest unit, about 2 cents a hundred? I say, assuming the statements I have made and the figures I have given to be approximately true, are you going to take that position?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have not taken the position in my report or anywhere else, so far as I am aware. The position I took was stated as concisely as I can state it in the stenographer's notes, and I would rather have it put in just that way. A number of those statements are about matters with which I am not familiar. I think that doubtless on the whole your relative rate statement is a pretty fair statement, but that does not alter the proposition that to whatever extent the toll is imposed—whether it is 1 cent or $1—it does reduce to that extent, as any tax does, the utility of the canal as a competing factor in the commerce between the two seaboards.

The CHAIRMAN. Isn't it true, Mr. Chamberlain, that when we add the toll to the water rate it is still less than half the possible railroad rate?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Absolutely true, and it will continue to be true. It may be unappreciable; a tax of 1 cent would not amount to anything at all, but you might as well have no canal at all as to have a tax of $10. Now, between those points there is a fair tax. That is an elementary proposition.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Any charge might reduce the profit of the shipowners, but it would not necessarily cripple water transportation as a competitor of railroad transportation; it would not necessarily cripple it and prevent it from carrying traffic through the canal, would it, unless it was exorbitant?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I did not say cripple; I said diminish—there is all the difference in the world between the two.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Then you might turn the argument around and say that if you give the shipping interests free tolls, so that their competitive ability will not be crippled or diminished, then the railroad necessarily will be crippled as a competitor of water transportation?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will refer you to the Railway Age or any number of other papers, particularly papers devoted to railroad interests. It is precisely the position they would take. (Hearings, pp. 881–882.)

FOURTH—WILL DENY SHIPPING FACILITIES TO MINOR PORTS.

The fourth reason for the position which I have taken is that thus far, except by one company, so far as I am aware, there has been no substantial provision made for the use of the canal in the coastwise trade, and that unless, when the canal is ready for business in about two years from now, there is adequate provision for coastwise transportation—not only that transportation which the American Hawaiian Line will furnish between New York and San Francisco and Honolulu, with their large and their very fine ships, which will probably be very nearly adequate for that purpose.

The American Hawaiian Co. is the one company which is now substantially equipped to carry on the canal coastwise business. They have a fine fleet of ships. It is a fleet of ships that is built up to carry sugar from Hawaii. They are building five new ships now, and when those are completed, which will be early in 1913, that fleet will be capable of carrying about 1,200,000 tons of cargo in the course of a year from the Atlantic to the Pacific or from the Pacific to the Atlantic. * * * This fleet will cover the situation so far as the trade between San Francisco and Hawaii and New York and possibly New Orleans on the other side is concerned. But there will be an insistent demand from the smaller ports, and it must be met, and it ought to be met. (Hearings, pp. 882–883.)

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In the case of these smaller ports, having only occasional cargoes and not having regular lines of communication for transportation through the canal to the Pacific ports and vice versa, the demand will be inevitable—I won't undertake to say that it will not be justified—"If the American ships are not here we must have foreign ships." The claim will be made, "Here is this canal, built at enormous cost; we can not be barred out from the use of the canal." (Hearings, p. 890.)

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Your conclusion is, in addition to all the statements that have been made, that the one essential to the securing of ships that will gather up and transport the traffic from these little ports is free tolls? In the absence of free tolls, the conclusion from your argument is that that can not be done? If that is not your conclusion, what is it? We will have ships to handle the traffic from those ports, and those ships will have an absolute monopoly, to handle the traffic between these large ports. But here are these small ports; no big ships will put into them unless they can be given the right to take this traffic through the canal free. Therefore, in order to favor these small ports in this respect, having to treat them all alike, we must throw the canal open to the traffic of all the ports?

Mr. KNOWLAND. Do I understand the witness to state that for all the large ports on the Pacific and Atlantic coasts, under present conditions, there will be adequate shipping facilities for the increased commerce expected?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Absolutely; the present commerce is what I am talking about. I think I made the statement that the tonnage of the American Hawaiian fleet is capable of transporting 1,200,000 tons avoirdupois from one coast to the other, and that is more than the present actual transportation, as I understand it. (Hearings, p. 891.)

COMMISSIONER'S TESTIMONY FOR FREE TOLLS SUMMARIZED.

I have endeavored in the foregoing quotations to assemble all of the reasons given by the commissioner before the committee to support his allegations and to assemble them as fully and fairly as the commissioner concedes I assembled the quotations from his reports. The commissioner in his report asserted that free tolls would be necessary to furnish the canal with domestic shipping and to preserve American shipbuilding yards and the American coastwise trade. In marshaling his reasons, four in number, for these assertions, his position is boiled down to the single small proposition that free tolls will be necessary to furnish certain minor ports with shipping facilities.

At page 891 he make the distinct and final assertion that—and I quote verbatim—

The tonnage of the American-Hawaiian fleet is capable of transporting 1,200,000 tons avoirdupois from one coast to another, and that is more than the present actual transportation, as I understand it.

Commissioner Chamberlain's estimate of the capacity of the American-Hawaiian line to furnish shipping facilities for the Panama Canal in the domestic trade is fully borne out by the testimony of Mr. George S. Dearborn, the able president of that company, whose testimony, to which I shall refer later, was a distinct pleasure to the committee, sounding, as it did, the first optimistic note in these hearings and holding out the first assurance that the Panama Canal, when completed and opened for traffic, will not go begging for ships.

Commissioner Chamberlain, by his own statements, has disposed of any claim that free tolls will be necessary to furnish the Panama Canal with ships. One existing company alone, as admitted by the commissioner and as shown hereafter, will be able to do this at the outset, and there are others, as I shall show, already in existence, so that we may anticipate from the beginning not only a sufficient service but competition for traffic, a competition, however, that will not, in my judgment, extend to rates. I have had the ablest advocates of free tolls admit to me that the boat lines using the Panama Canal will not compete as to rates among themselves, but these same gentlemen contend that there will be real competition between the water and rail lines. Some charity may be felt for the makers of such an illogical contention, when it is borne in mind that to concede a lack of competition between rail and water lines would be to admit themselves out of court upon their claim for free tolls.

The commissioner's first reason that Panama tolls will be, to quote his language, "a tax on interstate commerce," I have already disposed of. I think but few advocates of a free waterway will take such ground.

His second reason, that an act of Congress forbids tolls or operating charges upon vessels using waters improved for navigation by the Federal Government, carries but little force when extended to such an extraordinary, such an unparalleled project, as the Panama Canal. This reason, I might suggest, may be more logically used by those who take the position that the canal shall be free to the vessels of the world; and, indeed, it has been advanced as an argument for a free shipway by no less a person than Mr. John Barrett.

The commissioner's third reason, that tolls will lessen or destroy the ability of the Panama Canal to compete with the transcontinental railroads, I shall pass by for the present, to be considered in connection with the testimony of persons who are especially concerned and who assume to speak by the card. It may be noted, however, that the commissioner in mentioning very low and very high tolls, made the following significant statement:

Now, between those points there is a fair tax.

The commissioner could not avoid this statement at the time and place. He had been going over this question exhaustively before the committee. His postulates had been searched by them. These postulates did not stand the full test, as, indeed, they could not, no matter by whom formulated. And with the frankness of a reasonable mind, recognizing at least a partial truth in the opposing position, he was constrained to say:

Now, between those points there is a fair tax.

Indeed, while the commissioner's report clearly gives the impression that he is unqualifiedly for free tolls and regards free tolls as absolutely essential to the success of the Panama Canal from the domestic standpoint, he still further qualifies that impression by quoting at the hearing (p. 873) the following from page 8 of his annual report:

It is not questioned that the traffic of the Panama Canal should supply revenue for its maintenance and possibly in time for the partial amortization of the expense incurred in construction. Toward this revenue we must ourselves contribute in some way, for even if our treaty obligations will permit us to impose upon foreign nations the entire burden of paying for the canal, not for an instant would there be the disposition to adopt so ungracious a policy, or, in fact, could it be commercially feasible?

The only logical deduction to be drawn from this statement is that it suggests the imposition of some charge upon domestic shipping using the canal. All of the matter following it, however, points, not toward any contribution at all upon the part of domestic shipping, but toward free tolls. When, therefore, the commissioner at the hearings quotes from his report for the express purpose of rebutting the inference that he demands an absolutely free shipway for American shipping, he simply confuses his actual position and renders it unfit as to what his exact opinion may be. In this respect, however, the commissioner does not differ from other advocates of free tolls. Not one of them was able to sustain this position. The two most enthusiastic advocates of free tolls who appeared before the committee so signally failed to sustain their position that they held out the transcript of the hearings for correction for more than a month and finally prevailed upon the committee to accept a completely rewritten version of their testimony.

The commissioner's fourth reason for free tolls, which I have already mentioned, is that this exemption will be necessary to furnish the minor ports with shipping. I submit that the commissioner's elucidation of this point is unsatisfactory and unconvincing, so much so that I am unable to present more than a meager and fragmentary record from the hearings. Indeed, these ports are almost conjectural. No list of them was given to the committee, although inquiry was made concerning them, and they are not even of sufficient importance to be touched by any of the several boat lines in the coastwise trade. In addition, it is conceded by the commissioner that sea traffic from these minor ports does not now exist, but must be conjured into existence by means of free tolls. With all due respect to the opinion of the commissioner, I do not consider his fourth and final proposition at all convincing or his position with respect thereto tenable.

SUEZ CANAL SUBSIDIES.

Too much attention and importance can not be given to the report of the Commissioner of Navigation. It is the most elaborate effort that has been made in support of free tolls and is clothed with the sanction of that bureau of the Government which was enabled to foster, promote, and develop the shipping industry of the United States. Among other arguments resorted to by the commissioner are certain subsidies granted by European Governments to certain ship lines using the Suez Canal.

On page 15 of his report appears the following statement:

About 25 per cent of the Suez Canal tolls on foreign merchant vessels are now paid in one form or another from the treasuries of the nations whose flags those vessels fly, respectively.

This is advanced as an argument in behalf of some such treatment by this Government of American shipping through the Panama Canal. It would appear that the percentage, to wit, 25 per cent, would rather be an argument to the contrary, but an analysis of the commissioner's figures set out on pages 16 and 17 of the report do not sustain even this small percentage, and upon such analysis it does not appear that any subsidies are paid to vessels using the Suez Canal as compensation for toll charges, except by the Governments of Russia and Austria, Russia, it is said, rebating in full and Austria rebating under certain limited conditions. For instance, on page 16 it will be noted that in the year 1910 the fleet of the British Peninsular & Oriental Steamship Co., the largest using the canal, its tonnage for that year aggregating 1,214,200 net tons of the total of 16,581,900 net tons transiting the Suez Canal, paid out in tolls £357,989 and received in subsidies £297,143. This showing, however, is followed by the following significant statement:

The subsidy is paid to its mail steamers, but it operates slower boats.

The plain meaning of this statement is that the freight vessels of the English companies using the Suez Canal receive no subsidies whatever. The subsidies are all paid to the mail steamers, and the mail steamers of the English steamship lines are subsidized whether they use the Suez Canal or not. The report, therefore, in this particular borders upon the danger of being misleading. These data are stated in such manner as to be susceptible of the construction and of conveying the impression that 25 per cent of the Suez Canal tolls are rebated in the form of subsidies by the Government whose flags these vessels fly, when an analysis of the report makes it doubtful whether in the case of England, for instance, which owns approximately one-half the stock of the Panama Canal and whose vessels furnish it with a greater proportion of its traffic than any other country, repays any toll charges per se whatever, but it is perfectly clear that no toll charges are paid freight vessels. As there will be no passenger or mail coast-to-coast traffic through the Panama Canal, it is clear that the action of the British Government furnishes an unqualified argument against subsidies or rebates to American shipping through the Panama Canal. I shall conclude this topic by inserting the following colloquy with reference to it from the hearings (p. 979):

Mr. J. A. MARTIN. I want to get back to this subsidy proposition. I think the disclosure in your report that the British company operates slower boats through the Suez Canal, which are not subsidized and which carry the freight, removes the entire foundation upon which you base your argument for free tolls through the Panama Canal, to wit, that England is subsidizing her ships through the Suez Canal, but I want to analyze the report a little further. You say, on page 15, as follows:

"About 25 per cent of the Suez Canal tolls are now paid in one form or another from the treasuries of the nations whose flags those vessels fly, respectively. In some instances the appropriation is made in terms to pay the Suez tolls, as the Russian budget in 1909 carried an item of 650,000 rubles ($334,750) to pay the tolls of the merchant steamships of the Russian volunteer fleet."

I find further on that you include in that 25 per cent the £297,143 6s. 8d. of subsidies paid by the British Government to the Peninsular & Oriental Steamship Co.:

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. J. A. MARTIN. And that you include in that 25 per cent the subsidy paid to every ship that goes through the Suez Canal without regard to what the subsidy is paid for?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Every one that is specified.

Mr. J. A. MARTIN. You mention here the British Peninsular & Oriental Steamship Co., £297,143 6s. 8d.; the North German Lloyd, $1,385,150; and you go on down and conclude with the statement that "without giving other available details enough doubtless has been presented to warrant the statement that the subsidies and bounties paid to foreign steamships through the Suez Canal were over 25 per cent of the Suez tonnage receipts of 127,203,395 francs in 1910." So, in the first place, while the mere payment of 25 per cent of the tolls through the Suez Canal by the Governments whose ships operate through that canal would be a rather slim foundation for an argument for free tolls through the Panama Canal, yet, as a matter of fact, when you come to analyze these figures, it does not appear that a single dollar of these amounts that are set out here was specifically paid for the purpose of repaying those ships for Suez tolls.

The CHAIRMAN. Except Austria.

Mr. J. A. MARTIN. None of these companies get Suez Canal toll rebates, except Austria's.

The CHAIRMAN. The witness said that it was estimated to be equivalent to it. It is not in the contract?

Mr. J. A. MARTIN. I do not think it is any disparagement of the commissioner's integrity to say that he has made in this report a statement calculated to convey the impression that over 25 per cent of the Suez Canal tolls are rebated directly or indirectly to the ships using that canal.

COMMISSIONER OF NAVIGATION V. THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

I have gone at considerable length into the report and testimony of the Commissioner of Navigation, but I have not given it greater attention than its importance warrants. His official position lends weight to his views, which have been widely published, and will be much quoted and relied upon in the future in the event tolls are levied upon domestic shipping, to show the injury thus done such shipping and the benefits that would have flowed from the contrary course. I would not for a moment seek to minimize the good work done by the commissioner. I have not met a Government official more zealously devoted to his work. There is no question but what he is heart and soul for an American merchant marine, and he is not one who proposes that the causes which have driven the American flag from the seas, to wit, prohibitive tariffs and Chinese navigation laws, shall remain in force and operation while the effect shall be relieved or overcome by Government bounties.

The commissioner recognizes the necessity of and recommends reforms in these respects. But I can not concede that he has made out any case at all for a free canal. Under analysis, his showing with reference to Suez toll subsidies dissolves. He admits frankly that when the canal opens the domestic shipping facilities will exceed the available tonnage. He also admits that American shipping must bear some share of the burden of the canal and that there is a fair rate, but he does not shed any light upon what either the share of the burden or the rate ought properly to be. I believe and I submit that the fair share and the fair rate will be found by the Executive within the limits fixed in the pending bill.

If any favors are to be shown American shipping through the canal, I would incline rather to the view of the Secretary of War, who in his address before the Commercial Club at Kansas City on November 14, 1911, said:

This question of tolls has thus far been discussed mainly with respect to our coastwise traffic. This coastwise trade presents a special problem. In one respect it has less need of a canal subsidy than our foreign trade, because it already has a Government monopoly. While our vessels engaged in foreign trade have been virtually driven off the ocean by foreign competition, our coasting trade still exists, because no other than American vessels are permitted by law to engage in it.

The Secretary's principal reason for favoring the coastwise trade is railroad competition. But even upon this proposition he qualifies by saying:

Experience may show that our coastwise lines can meet their railroad competition without this additional aid. To give it under such circumstances would not lower rates; it would simply add to the profits of the shipowner.

If there has been any one point clearly established by the testimony on this question, as I shall now proceed to show, it is that the coastwise lines can meet their railroad competition without the aid of free or preferential tolls.

WATER V. RAILROAD TRANSPORTATION COST.

A substantial part of the canal propaganda rests upon the relative cheapness of water as compared with rail transportation. All advocates of free tolls will tell you in one breath that water is vastly cheaper than rail transportation and in the next breath that the water can not meet the rail competition unless they are donated a sum, which the facts all accord in showing does not equal one-half, nor one-quarter, I might say not one-tenth of the difference in transportation cost in favor of the water carrier.

When several of the advocates of free tolls were before the committee, and particularly when the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] was before it, I marshaled quotations from a number of publications and authorities going to show that the cost of water transportation, not the charge, mind you, but the cost, is on an average but one-third that of rail transportation, quoting only the figures of coast publications and representatives which are clamoring for free tolls.

I shall insert at this point in my remarks a summarization of some of these statements as they were presented to Mr. HUMPHREY and appear in the hearings with his replies; these statements having been summarized to him in this manner for the purpose of ascertaining his opinion, conceding the statements to be even approximately true, whether free tolls were necessary in order to enable the canal to compete with the transcontinental railroads. Mr. HUMPHREY is here to speak for himself. He was not able to say to the committee and he will not be able to say to the House that free tolls are necessary to enable the canal to compete with the railroads. And if it is not necessary, then what tangible, sensible purpose is to be accomplished by it? Nobody would dare propose that the railroads should be given any handicap or advantage over the canal; then, why should the reverse be asked? If, with a reasonable toll charge, the canal will have sufficient vessels, and these vessels can compete strongly and effectively with the railways, and can transport from coast to coast at one-half or less of the actual cost of railroad transportation, this would appear to be a fair solution of the problem, and this solution is so apparent that its opponents, when pinned down to facts, when smoked out of the haze of glittering generalities with which they are prone to invest the subject, can not get away from it.

I may say in passing that the quotations I am inserting not only contain figures quoted by free-toll publications showing, for instance, the rail fruit rate from the Pacific to the Atlantic coast to be more than $27 per ton, while it may be transported via the canal at a cost of $7 per ton, but statements before the Senate Commerce Committee by Mr. B. N. Baker, who organized and for 20 years successfully conducted the Atlantic Steamship Co., show the rail cost to be from three to four times the water cost:

RAIL COST THREE TIMES THAT OF WATER.

Mr. J. A. MARTIN. Fruit is transported by means of the transcontinental railroads from the Pacific coast to the Atlantic coast at $25.76 a ton. There is about 1,000,000 tons of this fruit traffic annually, which could be shipped from Los Angeles to New York via the Panama Canal at a cost of $7 a ton. I quoted from Collier's Weekly of September 30, 1911. I also quote from the testimony of Mr. B. N. Baker on Senate resolution 98, Sixty-second Congress, before the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, November 20, 1911, page 255. Mr. Baker is considered the leading authority on this question in the United States, the only man who has demonstrated that he could make good in the shipping business. He organized and very successfully conducted for 20 years a large steamship line on the Atlantic Ocean, which he sold to the American interests some years ago. He lives in Baltimore. [Reading:]

"This is my opinion, and I think the opinion of every steamboat man would confirm it—the suggestion I made was $7. (We always name a rate per 40 cubic feet for refrigerated space.) That cost was about $7 a ton, plus the tolls. I think it can be done for that. I would like to enter a large contract if I could do it for that much. That is such a small percentage—about 33⅓ per cent of the present rail rate—and it is business of an enormous volume.

"The present rate by rail is $1.15 and icing, which makes it, I figure, about $27.50 per ton, on the basis of a steamship ton.

"The ACTING CHAIRMAN. $1.15 a hundred?

"Mr. BAKER. Yes, sir. That would make about a third of a rate—a $7 rate."

That was his statement on the toll question generally.

The CHAIRMAN. He has tried to organize a steamship company, and the object he has is that all would get rich running steamship lines.

Mr. HUMPHREY. You notice that he did not do it. (Hearings, p. 1075.)

Mr. J. A. MARTIN. I want also to quote the statement from the Manufacturers' Record of September 7, 1911 [reading]:

"That the Panama Canal would enable the manufacturers and producers on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts to put their goods in the Pacific coast trade at about one-third of the present freight rate."

I want also to quote from the New York Evening Post of September 8, 1911, as follows:

"Many people will ask why the Government has placed such unusual restrictions upon successful bidders for mail contracts. The answer is that the Panama Canal, when completed, will bring San Francisco by water within 14 days of New York, less time than now taken by transcontinental freight trains, and with no expensive roadbed equipment to maintain. Steamboats will be able to handle coast-to-coast business at a much lower rate than the railroads."

I want to quote from the Seattle Post-Intelligencer of September 16, 1911, as follows:

"The actual cost of moving goods by water from the Atlantic seacoast to the Pacific coast when the canal is completed will be far below the actual cost of moving freight by rail."

Mr. HUMPHREY. I think that is right. Nobody can dispute that.

The CHAIRMAN. If that is correct, how can the railroads compete with the canal rates?

Mr. HUMPHREY. They do it all the time.

Mr. J. A. MARTIN. I want to quote again from Mr. Baker's testimony, the same document that I referred to before, at page 264, as follows:

"Mr. BAKER. The almost universal basis is that you can haul 3 miles of water freight for the cost of hauling 1 mile by rail. All the original old prorating agreements in the Atlantic Transport Co. was on that basis, up to 3,000 miles, the distance from New York to European points generally. Longer than 3,000 miles, when we took goods, for instance, down to Durban, South Africa, via London, then they would demand of us that we would carry the longer water distance for a rate that would be much less, or 4 to 1, so that anyone can make a calculation on this basis. The distance from New York to San Francisco via the Panama Canal will be practically 5,300 miles. That would be equivalent to one-third the number of miles of rail—what it would cost to take it that distance.

"When you come to the transcontinental traffic and crossing the two ranges of mountains (even taking the longer distance in the nearly level route of the Southern Pacific), it costs rather more per ton per mile to operate over the heavier grades and mountains than it does that way.

"Senator NEWLANDS. But you only have 3,000 miles by one route and you have over 5,000 miles by water.

"Mr. BAKER. It would be equivalent to 9,000 miles by water. The difference between those two would be the general saving.

"When you come to certain classes of commodities, there is a greater difference than that. You take what are known as the commodity rates. Take lumber, for instance—a ship coming around there, about a 12-knot ship, with lumber from Seattle—I have not the exact distance—you ought to bring lumber on that 12-knot boat at about $6 a thousand; $6 a ton. You ought to be able to do it, plus any canal tollage."

The first question I want to ask the witness on that statement of facts, assuming these facts to be approximately true—he may deny the assumption as much as he pleases—but, assuming the facts that I have stated to be approximately true and assuming that the toll rate through the Panama Canal will be fixed on the net registered-ton basis, about $1 per net registered ton, which is about 40 cents per actual cargo ton, or about 2 cents per 100 pounds, and, taken in connection with the absolute monopoly given the coast-to-coast trade by our Federal laws, do you take the position that the donation of this toll to the coast-to-coast shipping is necessary in order to enable it to be honestly competitive with the transcontinental railroads?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I do not know whether it is necessary or not, but it would be that much advantage. * * * I am not familiar with railroad rates, but I do not think that you need worry about the railroads being driven out of business. I think that they can take care of themselves. (Hearings, p. 1076.)

FURTHER TESTIMONY SHOWING THAT REASONABLE TOLLS WILL NOT AFFECT CANAL.

Other testimony, and testimony going chiefly to other points, sustain the main fact in the foregoing quotations—the fact that water is so cheap as compared with rail transportation that the imposition of a moderate toll upon the former will have no bearing whatever upon the competitive ability of the waterway.

But this proposition need not rest alone for demonstration upon what men may say as to what the isthmian route can do, but it can also be demonstrated by what that route has done. It can be shown—and I shall insert the testimony from the hearings to that effect at this point—that freight has been transported right along from coast to coast as low as $8 per ton, which included the railroad rate and the cost of the two transfers involved.

Several gentlemen gave such testimony, among them Mr. William R. Wheeler, manager of the traffic bureau of the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce. Mr. Wheeler stated that in order to meet the monopoly enjoyed by the Southern Pacific Railroad Co., which controls the rail situation from California east and controls the Panama situation by its ownership of the Pacific Mail Steamship Co., there was organized the California & Atlantic Steamship Co., which only last year carried 115,000 tons of eastbound traffic via the Panama route at $8 per ton; that in order to destroy its competitor the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. cut the rate to $5 per ton, and that but for the intervention of the President, who required the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. to restore the $8 rate, the competing line would have been put out of business.

Mr. Wheeler, in showing the great advantage of the canal, stated among other things that the American-Hawaiian Steamship Line, for example—will not have to give up one-third of its earnings to its railroad connection—

And admits—

There will be a great reduction even with a reasonable toll. There is no doubt about that.

Nevertheless and notwithstanding which Mr. Wheeler, like other coast representatives, and naturally so—I do not blame them in the least—wants free tolls; but, like his fellow workers in the cause, he wants free tolls without being able to show that he ought to have them.

Later on I shall take up separately the testimony of President Dearborn, of the American-Hawaiian Line, letting that very capable gentleman speak for himself as to the great advantage to his company of the Panama Canal over its present situation, in which it is required to pay one-third of its total receipts to the Mexican Government for its use of the Tehuantepec Railway.

GREAT RATE REDUCTIONS, EVEN WITH REASONABLE TOLLS.

Mr. WHEELER. The Pacific Mail Steamship Co., in addition to its trans-Pacific line, operates a line from San Francisco to Panama, and the capital stock of that company is controlled by the Southern Pacific Railroad Co. The Southern Pacific holds just a bare control, 50½ per cent, or $10,010,000, of the par value of the total capital stock. That line up until two years ago was the sole connection of the Panama Railroad & Steamship Line, operating between New York and Panama. The tariff of this line was based upon the transcontinental rail tariff. Any advances made in the transcontinental rail tariffs were immediately reflected in corresponding advances in the Panama route rates. Through the efforts of the organization which I have the honor to represent we were successful in first divorcing those rates from the transcontinental rates, and, second, in making it possible for a competing line to engage in the traffic between San Francisco and Paama, so that the Panama Railroad & Steamship Line has now two Pacific cocarriers operating between San Francisco and Panama.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Will you give the name of the other company?

Mr. WHEELER. The California & Atlantic Steamship Co. The result is that while in the fiscal year 1909, when the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. was the sole line upon the Pacific in connection with the Panama route to San Francisco, it carried but 8,728 tons of east-bound traffic, hardly a full shipload for one of Mr. Dearborn's largest vessels; in the fiscal year 1911 there was carried in east-bound traffic via the Panama route more than 115,000 tons.

Not long after the competing line went on—within a few months—a rate war was started. The Pacific Mail Steamship Co. put the rate upon California products, which had been $8 per ton, down to $5 per ton. It was obvious that the purpose was to run the line off, because the rate of $8 per ton was a satisfactory rate to our shippers.

Mr. E. W. MARTIN. Between what points was that?

Mr. WHEELER. Between San Francisco and New York. The rate of $8 a ton was satisfactory to our shippers. No shipper, so far as my knowledge goes, had asked for a $5 a ton rate. Had the administration not been prevailed upon to bring about a restoration of rates there is no doubt that the California & Atlantic Steamship Line would have gone to the wall. The fight lasted several months, but the rates are now restored on that line. (Hearings, p. 504.)

Mr. E. W. MARTIN. Does the Southern Pacific Railroad Co. still maintain its controlling interest in the Pacific Mail Steamship Co.?

Mr. WHEELER. According to my last advices it does. At any rate, it did up to a few weeks ago.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know of any other railroad company that contemplates running a line of ships on the canal?

Mr. WHEELER. No; I do not know of any railroad company that contemplates putting ships there. I do not know that the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. contemplates running ships through there.

The CHAIRMAN. You apprehend, though, that the Southern Pacific might find it desirable to run ships through there?

Mr. WHEELER. I think that would be a very natural result of opening the canal, provided no inhibitory legislation is passed. The Southern Pacific Railroad Co. has a fleet of vessels on the Atlantic engaged in traffic between New York, New Orleans, and Galveston. It has the control of the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. on the Pacific operating between San Francisco and Panama. It would not be difficult, of course, to connect up those two services.

The CHAIRMAN. How large a fleet have they in each ocean?

Mr. WHEELER. I think that the fleet engaged in the Panama service consists of about nine vessels. Is that right, Mr. Dearborn? You know better than I do about that.

Mr. DEARBORN. I should think about 9 or 10.

Mr. WHEELER. It is my impression that it is about that number. As to the fleet on the Atlantic, I do not know. They have the service to New Orleans and Galveston.

The CHAIRMAN. You say that they go to New Orleans and Galveston——

Mr. DEARBORN. They have two services—one to Galveston, which takes all the transcontinental freight, and another to New Orleans handling freight for that territory—local freight. That is my understanding. (Hearings, p. 505.)

Mr. SABATH. What is the present average rate between New York and San Francisco?

Mr. WHEELER. By steamer do you mean?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. WHEELER. I should say that west bound the average rate to-day is perhaps $12. Is that about it, Mr. Dearborn?

Mr. DEARBORN. I think it is higher than that. On an average it would be about $14.

Mr. SABATH. That is west-bound traffic?

Mr. DEARBORN. West bound.

Mr. SABATH. What is the average east-bound rate?

Mr. WHEELER. The average east-bound rate is about $10.

Mr. DEARBORN. I think it is less than that. I think it is about $8.50.

Mr. SABATH. After the canal is completed, with that saving taken into account by the steamship companies, what do you think the west-bound rate will be?

Mr. WHEELER. I would say that the reduction when the canal is completed, when Mr. Dearborn's line, for example, will not have to give up one-third of its earnings to its railroad connection, and likewise when no division has to be made at Panama with the Panama Railroad Co. or steamship line——

The CHAIRMAN. And no goods smashed up in transferring.

Mr. WHEELER. And no goods smashed up in transferring—I think that those rates will come very near being cut in two. That is my opinion.

Mr. SABATH. Then the coastwise trade between the two oceans will be benefited to the extent of about 50 per cent?

Mr. WHEELER. I should say so, provided no tolls are charged.

Mr. SABATH. That at 50 per cent would be about $7 one way and $4 the other way. Will the tolls make any difference really, or will not the coastwise trade be benefited to the extent of about 40 per cent, even if we do charge a dollar per ton? Do you see what I am trying to find out?

Mr. WHEELER. As I understand it, you mean whether there will not be an ample reduction without waiving the tolls.
Mr. SABATH. And bounties.
Mr. WHEELER. There will be a great reduction even with a reasonable toll. There is no doubt about that. But by the measure of the toll if it is waived——
Mr. SABATH. There will be a still greater benefit.
Mr. WHEELER. There will be a still greater benefit. (Hearings, p. 529.)

FREE TOLLS WILL NOT BENEFIT CONSUMERS.

If free tolls are not necessary to furnish the canal with vessels and enable them to do business against the railroads, the only conjectural remaining reason for the exemption would be that the removal of the rate would to that extent benefit the consumer. Appreciating this situation, the advocates of free tolls, as a matter of course, loudly protest that it is the intention to benefit only the consumer and not the shipowner, and they admit of no question but what the consumer will get the benefit of free tolls. Obviously to do otherwise would be fatal to their contention. But even on this proposition they failed before the committee, as they must fail in practical experience.

Among other witnesses who appeared before the committee was Mr. H. H. Raymond, vice president and general manager of the Clyde Steamship Co. and the Mallory Steamship Co., who said frankly that he did not believe the matter of a reasonable toll would make any difference to the consumer. The matter was put to him point blank as follows:

Mr. STEVENS. You know that it would not make any difference to the consumer, do you not?
Mr. RAYMOND. I do not believe that it would.

Mr. Raymond believed that it would benefit the shipowner, encourage shipping, and in this way benefit the public. I shall insert at this point a very interesting and instructive colloquy between the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] and Mr. Raymond on this point:

Mr. STEVENS. It has been stated a great many times—the records of our committees are full of such statements. If that be true, how much difference to the ordinary consumer would a rate of 50 cents per net ton make on goods transported from the Atlantic to the Pacific, or from the Pacific to the Atlantic?
Mr. RAYMOND. I could not answer.
Mr. STEVENS. You know that it would not make any difference to the consumer, do you not?
Mr. RAYMOND. I do not believe that it would.
Mr. KNOWLAND. Then who would get the advantage?
Mr. RAYMOND. The American ship—the American public.
Mr. STEVENS. The American public—in what way would the American public get the advantage of it?
Mr. RAYMOND. They would not have to pay so much on the high commodities—on the heavy commodities. I am talking about the freight rates on your clothes.
Mr. STEVENS. If the rate was 55 cents per ton how much cheaper would it be to the American who buys lumber?
Mr. RAYMOND. I do not know. The American who buys lumber would probably buy it 25 cents a thousand cheaper.
Mr. STEVENS. How much cheaper would the American who bought lemons and oranges in California get them?
Mr. RAYMOND. I do not believe they would come through the canal.
Mr. STEVENS. The people on the coast are figuring on that. You think they are mistaken about that?
Mr. RAYMOND. I do.
Mr. STEVENS. How much cheaper would wool and stuff like that be?
Mr. RAYMOND. I do not know.
Mr. STEVENS. So that you could not give us any idea?
Mr. RAYMOND. No.
Mr. STEVENS. The most is that you can figure we will get lumber 25 cents a thousand cheaper?
Mr. RAYMOND. I do not know anything about the commodities; I am not a merchant; I am a transportation man.
Mr. STEVENS. So that you would not be willing to hazard any judgment of your own?
Mr. RAYMOND. No, sir.
Mr. STEVENS. As to how it would affect the man who finally buys the stuff and has to pay for it?
Mr. RAYMOND. No.
Mr. KNOWLAND. Except you would make the statement that whatever toll was remitted would be a benefit to the consumer?
Mr. RAYMOND. Absolutely.
Mr. STEVENS. That is just what I have been trying to find out.
Mr. RAYMOND. We have not any rates that give an unreasonable dividend. In fact, you can go into any business and make more money out of it than you can make out of the steamship business. (Hearings, p. 549.)

ATLANTIC COASTWISE BOAT LINE MONOPOLIES—NO COMPETITION.

But Mr. Raymond's testimony went to another proposition which, in my judgment, was even more illuminating and instructive and even more in the nature of fact rather than opinion, and that was his explanation to the committee that there are five different steamship lines in the Atlantic coastwise trade south from New York, no two of which have the same termini or traffic territory. As explained by Mr. Raymond, each of these lines enjoys an exclusive and undisputed monopoly of its own water route, port termini, and traffic territory. I can not take time to read this testimony, but it absolutely disposes of the idea that there is any competition whatever among the boat lines in the Atlantic coastwise trade:

TESTIMONY OF MR. RAYMOND, OF THE MALLORY AND CLYDE LINES.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. There are two lines that you are vice president of—the Clyde and Mallory.
Mr. RAYMOND. The Clyde does not go to Galveston, Tex.
Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The Clyde does; does it not?
Mr. RAYMOND. No, sir.
Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The Mallory and Morgan?
Mr. RAYMOND. The Mallory and Morgan?
Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Do go from New York to Galveston?
Mr. RAYMOND. Yes, sir.
Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Is there any difference in the rates between New York and Galveston on these two boat lines?
Mr. RAYMOND. Yes, sir.
Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Is not the fare identical?
Mr. RAYMOND. There is only one line that handles passengers, and that is the Mallory; there is no competition.
Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. From New York to Galveston?
Mr. RAYMOND. The Morgan does not handle passengers; no, sir.
Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. How many lines are there between New York and Key West handling passengers?
Mr. RAYMOND. Only one.
Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. What is that?
Mr. RAYMOND. The Mallory.
Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Are there any places on the coast where the Mallory has competition in the matter of hauling passengers?
Mr. RAYMOND. Not that I know of.
Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. It hauls them all—how does it come that the Mallory has no competition?
Mr. RAYMOND. Because nobody else has put any money into that service; that is all.
Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The Clyde does not carry passengers?
Mr. RAYMOND. The Clyde carries passengers, but it does not go to Galveston.
Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Does it go to any of the ports that the Mallory goes to?
The CHAIRMAN. It pays better to divide the ports up.
Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Is that the way it is done?
Mr. RAYMOND. No.
Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Let us see; we have got three lines out of New York—the Clyde, the Mallory, and the Morgan. Now, how many lines have we got in the coastwise trade going out of New York in addition to the Mallory, Morgan, and Clyde Lines?
Mr. RAYMOND. Out of New York?
Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Yes, sir.
Mr. RAYMOND. The Ocean Steamship Co.
Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. That is four.
Mr. RAYMOND. The Old Dominion; that is, coming south.
Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. That is what I mean.
Mr. RAYMOND. Coming south from American ports?
Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. That is what I want, in order not to scatter too much.
Mr. RAYMOND. The Old Dominion.
Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. That is five. Are there none of those carrying passengers into the same ports from New York, down along the Atlantic coast and return?
Mr. RAYMOND. No, sir.
Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. What do they do, then—have they just divided up the territory between themselves?
Mr. RAYMOND. No.
Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I do not understand why there is not an explanation for this. We have got the facts in a measure, but not the explanation as to why there is just one boat line in the coastwise trade of the Atlantic carrying passengers between New York and all these coast points around to Galveston and the Gulf.
Mr. RAYMOND. The explanation is that two would not pay.
The CHAIRMAN. I think that is a good one.
Mr. SIMS. How is it about the freight?
Mr. RAYMOND. The same.
The CHAIRMAN. Five or six lines and no two of them run between any two points?
Mr. RAYMOND. These lines here all originated years and years ago by private capital—merchants and other people did not see that they wanted to compete because where one could live two could not.
The CHAIRMAN. They were wisely located with a view to profit.
Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. This is rather an interesting line of testimony, I think. Your Mallory Line, then, hauls all the passenger traffic from New York south—the Atlantic coastwise passenger trade and around into the Gulf?
Mr. RAYMOND. That is your statement, not mine.
Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I have understood it to be yours.
Mr. RAYMOND. No, sir.
Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Hauls all of it, then, to certain ports.
Mr. RAYMOND. Handles all the passengers to the ports to which it operates where no other passenger line does.
Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Tell me this, then: Are not ports divided as to carrying passengers and to which no other passenger lines operate?
Mr. RAYMOND. I testified to that in the beginning.
Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Those that you named are the ones that it goes to—the Mallory Line?
Mr. RAYMOND. Yes, sir.
Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Which ports does the Clyde Line go to and to which the Mallory Line does not go to?
Mr. RAYMOND. The Mallory, if you want it, goes to the following ports, or operates, rather, between the following ports: New York and Key West, New York and Tampa, New York and Mobile, New York and Galveston; it handles passengers and cargo to all of those ports.
The Clyde operates between New York and Philadelphia, and between Boston and Charleston, New York and Jacksonville, New York and Wilmington—all those other places that I named in the beginning; and they carry passengers only to two ports, Charleston and Jacksonville.
Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. What is the Morgan Line in the way of freight and passenger?
Mr. RAYMOND. They operate freight and passenger service between New York and New Orleans?
Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. What is this Ocean Steamship Line and what has this Ocean Steamship Line got?
Mr. RAYMOND. Between New York and Savannah.
Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Did you name another besides the Ocean?
Mr. RAYMOND. Not coming south—the Old Dominion between New York and Norfolk.
Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. How did this division of territory come about between these five lines?
Mr. RAYMOND. It is perfectly natural.
Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Natural growth?
Mr. RAYMOND. Natural growth.

AMPLE SHIPPING FACILITIES AWAIT OPENING OF CANAL.

The testimony of Mr. Raymond also goes to create a suspicion, which is strengthened by the statements of others, that there will be but little, if any, more competition, even in the matter of service, to say nothing of rates, from coast to coast than now exists in the Atlantic coastwise trade. Mr. Raymond makes it clear that neither of his lines are contemplating any conquest over canal traffic, and the impression is gathered from Mr. Raymond that none of the five Atlantic coastwise lines will put a single boat through the Panama Canal. They each have their little monopoly and are going to keep it. They are not going to invite trouble by poaching on other preserves. The American-Hawaiian Line, which is now doing the principal trans-Isthmian traffic, may continue so far as these Atlantic coast lines are concerned. If the American-Hawaiian has any competition, it must come from one or two small independent Pacific coast lines, whose boats are shown by the Commissioner of Navigation to be too small for that trade, or its competition must come from the Pacific Mail Steamship Co., which will put a fleet of big steamers through the canal if not prevented by law.

The two coastwise lines under the management of Mr. Raymond operate about 45 boats. Some of these exceed the 4,000 tonnage, which Mr. Raymond concurs with Commissioner Chamberlain and others in saying is the practical minimum for canal traffic. He estimates that there are 200 vessels, all told, in the Atlantic coastwise trade south of Boston. According to Mr. Raymond there should be nothing in law to prevent any of his boats of sufficient tonnage from transiting the canal, as he is positive in his statements that his lines are not owned or controlled by railroad companies. On the whole, therefore, it would appear that the supply of available shipping facilities for the canal will far exceed the demand, and that if the great majority of existing American boat lines do not engage in that traffic it will be because they prefer to follow the rule of the sea, upon which discovery and occupancy gives the better right. I attach hereto the list of vessels of the American-Hawaiian fleet, 18 in number and ranging in gross tonnage from 4,408 to 8,671 tons, a sufficient tonnage for canal traffic (hearings, p. 884):

SUMMARY OF VESSELS AVAILABLE FOR THE PANAMA CANAL.

The testimony as to vessels available for the domestic Panama service is considerably scattered, and it may prove of some service to investigators to collect and present it in succinct form.

Easily at the head of the list will stand the American-Hawaiian Line with its 23 vessels of about 10,000 gross tonnage each.

The Luckenback Line consists of approximately 10 vessels of 4,000 to 6,000 tons. Some of these vessels have been plying via the Strait of Magellan. Like the American-Hawaiian Line, the Luckenback is capable of enlarging.

The Pacific Mail Steamship Co. has a fleet of approximately 10 steamers on the Pacific and is said to be awaiting the action of Congress as to whether it will permit railroad-controlled vessels to use the canal before undertaking the construction of some very large vessels for this trade. Notwithstanding the "if" now in the way of the use of the canal by the Pacific Mail Steamship Co., to wit, the proposed prohibition of the use of the canal by railroad-controlled boats, I venture the prediction that the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. will find a way to enter the Panama route. It will enter the Panama route or cease to exist, and it is not in the logic of things that the steamship line which has for more than 20 years past been supplying practically all of the Pacific coast traffic to the Panama Railroad should go out of business when the canal opens and turn this traffic over to others. This, I think, will hardly occur.

The same prediction may be hazarded of the California-Atlantic Steamship Co., with its present Panama-Pacific fleet of seven boats, which was organized to fight the Southern Pacific-Pacific Mail in the Panama trade, and which Mr. Wheeler testifies it is doing successfully.

It is claimed that the tonnage of the Pacific Mail and the California-Pacific Lines is somewhat light for the coast-to-coast service, which calls for vessels of about 4,000 gross tons, but there is little doubt the heavier of them would traverse the canal with the cargoes they are now delivering to the Panama Railroad at Balboa, and that they will build larger vessels.

The Mallory and Clyde Lines, it has also been pointed out, now have a number of vessels in the Atlantic coastwise trade of sufficient tonnage to enter the canal route if they elect to do so. And there are doubtless others.

THE AMERICAN-HAWAIIAN STEAMSHIP CO.

That the Panama Canal, while exacting a reasonable toll from domestic shipping, will be fully able to compete with the transcontinental railroads, to cause substantial reductions in transcontinental rail rates, and to wrest a part of their present traffic from the transcontinental roads, is clearly established by the testimony of Mr. George S. Dearborn, president of the American-Hawaiian Steamship Co.

In 12 years this company has built up a fleet of 18 steamers of about 10,000 gross tons each, and which now handles an annual traffic of 750,000 tons from the Hawaiian Islands and the Pacific coast, but principally from the Hawaiians, and the company is now constructing 5 more of these large steamers, so that, against the opening of the Panama Canal, the American-Hawaiian Steamship Co. will be ready to supply it with a fleet of 23 large steamers, with a carrying capacity of 1,500,000 tons annually, which is larger than the existing coast-to-coast water tonnage.

CAN PAY TOLLS AND COMPETE WITH RAILROADS.

Upon the question of the present and future capacity of his steamship company and to what source it will look for additional traffic, Mr. Dearborn said:

We are prepared to-day to almost double our tonnage through the canal with the ships we are building, and if we did not believe we could make such rates as would divert to us 750,000 tons more from the railroads we would not build the ships. With the ships we are building and the shorter time we could make through the canal, if our plans are carried out, we will acquire double the quantity of freight we are getting to-day. We are getting all we can handle to-day. When it comes to the canal, if we are building these ships to take 750,000 tons more from the railroads, we have got to lower the rate.

I challenge the production from all the mass of testimony in either House of Congress touching the traffic and competitive possibilities of the Panama Canal that will equal in significance, that will compare in the number and importance of the facts embraced, with the statement I have just read.

GREAT ADVANTAGES OF THE CANAL.

Mr. Dearborn had just stated that his company would not require free tolls in order to do business through the canal. In answer to a question as to whether he could pay a dollar per net registered ton through the Panama Canal and do even better than he is now doing across the Tehuantepec route, Mr. Dearborn said:

Sure; there is no argument about that. The no-toll business is a matter of principle. We would not spend $1 in any propaganda for no tolls, because the shipper is going to pay for it. It is an operating expense.

With the paying of tolls, therefore, as a factor in his calculations, and implied in the paragraph which I have read, that single paragraph may be resolved into the following highly important facts:

First. The American-Hawaiian Steamship Co. can pay canal tolls at $1 per ton.

Second. It can double its present traffic of 750,000 tons.

Third. It proposes to take this tonnage from the transcontinental railroads.

Fourth. It will lower its rates to get this tonnage from the railroads.

Fifth. Even at its existing high rates the steamship company is getting all the business it can handle.

Sixth. The railroads must lower their rates, notwithstanding which some of their existing traffic will be divided with the canal.

This important testimony, which serves concretely to put the Panama Canal before us as a vital factor in domestic commerce, followed a question as to the cost to the American-Hawaiian Co. of its Tehuantepec railway connection, and I shall insert here the brief colloquy leading up to the statement that I have read in full and analyzed.

SHIPPER WILL PAY TOLLS—AN OPERATING EXPENSE.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Would you mind telling us this—about what your Tehuantepec transshipment costs you per net registered ton?

Mr. DEARBORN. That would take some figuring.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. You are able to do business now, and you are building your business up, I think, fairly satisfactorily, at the rate you are acquiring ships, from Hawaii to New York, and from the Pacific to the Atlantic coast, notwithstanding the cost of the Tehuantepec transshipment?

Mr. DEARBORN. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. And it simply occurred to me that if you could do that, you could pay, say, a dollar per net registered ton through the Panama Canal and do even better than you are doing now.

Mr. DEARBORN. Surely; there is no argument about that.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. You do not have to get free tolls through the Panama Canal?

Mr. DEARBORN. The no-toll business is a matter of principle. We would not spend one dollar in any propaganda for no tolls, because the shipper is going to pay for it. It is an operating expense.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Just like "Jones pay the freight," the shipper pays railroad taxes?

Mr. KNOWLAND. Your contention is that any toll would come out of the shipper?

Mr. DEARBORN. That is it.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Would your Tehuantepec transshipment cost be considerably more than a dollar per net registered ton?

Mr. DEARBORN. Certainly.

I will tell you what answers that question. We are prepared to-day to almost double our tonnage through the canal with the ships we are building, and if we did not believe we could make such rates as would divert to us 750,000 tons more from the railroads we would not build the ships. With the ships we are building, and the shorter time we could make through the canal, if our plans are carried out we will acquire double the quantity of freight we are getting to-day. We are getting all we can handle to-day. When it comes to the canal, if we are building these ships to take 750,000 tons more from the railroads, we have got to lower the rate.

NOW PAYING ONE-THIRD TO MEXICAN RAILWAY.

The question, however, did not bring the information sought at that point, but later this most material and instructive information was fully developed by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN], and I shall insert it in my remarks at this point:

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Approximately, can you indicate to the committee about what is the cost to your company for the transportation of dead-weight tonnage over the Tehuantepec route, including the cost of loading and unloading, the cost of transportation, and such habitual damages that you must pay by reason of the transfer?

Mr. DEARBORN. I would not want to make an offhand statement.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Just an approximation.

Mr. DEARBORN. You would have to take averages.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I mean averages, considering the entire business as a mass proposition.

Mr. DEARBORN. We were making estimates the other day; on 750,000 tons of freight our net profit was a few cents a ton. On the total freight we have it is about 20 cents a ton.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. On your whole business?

Mr. DEARBORN. On the whole business.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I am trying to ascertain how much of your expense is represented by the transfer at Tehuantepec. In other words, how much would you pay, in the course of your business, per ton, if you did not have the charges for the transfer at Tehuantepec?

Mr. DEARBORN. Now, you take sugar and other merchandise. Of course, sugar being dead-weight cargo and easier to handle, you get much lower rates. I should say, on an average, it must be something like $4 a ton. I should say——

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I wanted it translated into cost.

Mr. DEARBORN. About $4 a ton.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. That is your estimate on sugar cargo.

Mr. DEARBORN. That is on the whole. (Hearings, pp. 576–577.)

IMMENSE SAVING AND PROFIT TO SHIPPERS OF CANAL ROUTE.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I am pleased to say that it struck me all through the witness's testimony that we are arriving at some very impartial statements of facts. It has been claimed here by numerous witnesses, if not by their statements, at least by inference, that the question of applying a dollar net tonnage for the toll, which would be 40 or 50 cents dead-weight tonnage, might be the difference between attracting or driving away the American shipping industry as an element in coastwise trade, and, of course, your statement is quite different.

Mr. DEARBORN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CULLOP. What was the answer? Is the answer in the record?

Mr. DEARBORN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I will ask you again, along the line of my colleague's questioning with reference to the $4 per ton approximated to be the cost of transshipment over the Tehuantepec route. I understood that to be $4 per dead-weight ton of 2,000 pounds?

Mr. DEARBORN. That is right.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Now, the Panama charge will be a net-registered ton, we will assume, and this net-registered ton will hold about 2½ dead-weight tons, ordinarily, so that he would pay only 40 cents per dead-weight ton.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. In the question I asked, the answer to which Judge Cullop has thought, perhaps, was not given in the record, I asked, whether, supposing that the toll through the canal, for an estimate, might be considered as $1 per net ton, which I suggested, would be something like 40 or 50 cents in dead-weight tonnage.

Mr. DEARBORN. That applies to dead-weight cargoes. Take a cargo of sugar, which would load a ship to a dead-weight capacity. I say then that proportion would be right. Take our west-bound cargo, where our ship has only little dead-weight cargo, the toll applied to a ton of dead weight carried in the ship would be settled.

West bound we have about 50 per cent of her dead-weight capacity.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. And east bound you are practically carrying your capacity?

Mr. DEARBORN. Yes. So that there is less tax per ton on sugar than there is on the other freight?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. And the solution of that part of the problem would be that east bound your net-weight tonnage would vary much less than your west bound; you might be carrying more measurement of tonnage, and be carrying less in actual tonnage?

Mr. DEARBORN. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. The question that I was asking and about which there might be some doubt in the record was in substance this: It being understood that the committee might consider the subject of putting a toll to the amount of $1 per registered ton for transportation through the Panama Canal, which would, on a ship carrying its full cargo, mean 40 or 50 cents per ton, whether in your judgment that would be a controlling consideration as between the encouragement or discouragement of coastwise trade through the canal to determine whether it would be a profitable business or not?

Mr. DEARBORN. The lower the toll, the less the resistance of the movement of trade.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Naturally.

Mr. DEARBORN. Naturally it would result in a greater volume of business, to the extent that the business would be enlarged or contracted by the rate of toll.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Of course. That follows. If you are now carrying on your business by the Tehauntepec route, with a practical cost of transfer something like $4 per dead-weight ton——

Mr. DEARBORN. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. And you can, by the opening of the canal, even if we put a dollar toll upon the net tonnage, you can carry the business through there at 50 cents to $1 cargo tonnage, according to how you happen to be loaded, it would seem to be self-evident that the putting of the toll on there would not be a controlling factor in determining whether you would go through the canal?

Mr. DEARBORN. No. That is why I wish to deal with that on business lines. It would be ridiculous to treat the canal toll, as applied to domestic trade, on these lines. If you are going on the lines of what the traffic would bear, it would stand very much more. (Hearings, pp. 577–578.)

RÉSUMÉ OF CANAL ADVANTAGES.

This testimony shows that the American-Hawaiian Co. is paying the Mexican Government for transferring its cargo by rail across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec at the rate of $4 per cargo ton of 2,000 pounds. The same ton, say for instance of sugar, at a toll rate of $1 per net registered ton, would go through the Panama Canal for just 40 cents. That is the difference in cost between the canal and the railway, but it is only one of the canal advantages. To unload the ships at one side of the Isthmus, put the cargo in railway cars, transfer these cars across the Isthmus, unload them and reload the cargo in another ship takes time. According to the testimony it takes one-third of the entire time, or about 10 days out of a 30-day trip, and the boats must lie idle and return without cargoes, and the cargoes in the railway transshipment are more or less wasted and damaged, so that it is no exaggeration to say that if the Panama toll rate were to be made $4 per cargo ton instead of 40 cents, or were to be made $5 or even $6 per cargo ton, it would still be preferable in every way to the present Tehuantepec route. It is no wonder that shipowners may smile at the question as to whether the moderate toll rate proposed for the Panama Canal will injuriously affect its traffic.

Mr. Dearborn, however, while admitting that he does not need the tolls to enable him to do business or compete with the railroads, and while further concurring with Mr. Raymond, the manager of the Clyde and Mallory Steamship Lines, that the consumer would not be affected one way or another by the presence or absence of a reasonable toll, nevertheless furnished the committee prior to his examination with a printed statement in which he expressed the opinion that free tolls should be provided as an inducement to investment in the coastwise shipping business. In the same statement it is remarked that while the Pacific Coast States would derive the great benefit for which all of the country would be taxed, still the country would be benefited in obtaining Pacific coast products at lower prices. I refer to this printed statement principally as a basis of comment that these ex parte statements, when put to the test, always fail to produce any sustaining facts. Indeed, there is nothing in the exhaustive testimony of Mr. Dearborn to support a conclusion or even a probability that free tolls will result in the construction of a single ship for the canal route. Mr. Dearborn's company is constructing five ships in anticipation of the opening of the canal, and this without any reference whatever to the question of tolls. Mr. Dearborn is only human, and if the Federal Government proposes to make his company a present of the service which is now directly costing it $4 per cargo ton and indirectly perhaps half as much more, it is hardly to be expected that Mr. Dearborn will protest.

I do not wish, however, to have preserved in the record of this legislation a single remark which could be construed as even dealing lightly with any statement made by Mr. Dearborn, either in print or to the committee. I believe the entire committee, regardless of their attitude upon the question of tolls, experienced in listening to him a thrill of assurance that upon the completion and opening of the Panama Canal there would be a magnificent fleet of ships flying the American flag, waiting for its great lock gates to swing open and receive them. A spirit of optimism pervaded the committee on listening to this gentleman, who impressed everybody with a feeling of confidence and respect for his capability. Mr. Dearborn himself is the explanation of the great success of his company; his optimism, his quickness of mind, his grasp of the situation, his personality, all combined not only to explain the American-Hawaiian Steamship Line, but to assure the committee that when the great engineer who is constructing the canal had completed his work, a great shipper would be ready with a splendid line of boats to furnish it with traffic.

DISINTERESTED TESTIMONY ON THE TOLL QUESTION.

All the testimony thus far considered was adduced by interested persons, by those engaged in domestic shipping or the representatives of coast ports. I do not believe it is necessary to look beyond this testimony to justify the levying of a reasonable toll, such as is contemplated upon domestic shipping. Indeed, this testimony shows affirmatively, it affirmatively establishes from the lips of the shipowners themselves, that free tolls is not a vital factor in any problem concerning the Panama Canal. If the Government wishes to establish a free shipway for vessels in the domestic trade, it may do so, but it must do so with the knowledge and understanding that the sums involved—two or three or four or five million dollars per annum, as the case may be and as the traffic develops—will be net to the shipowners and to nobody else.

The Panama Canal will be too great a benefit to vessels which are now required either to round the Horn or transship by rail and too great a burden of expense to the Government to permit of any such purely sentimental policy as free tolls.

This proposition, already satisfactorily established, is more clearly shown when we consider the very valuable treatment of this problem by Dr. Johnson, the investigator assigned to this specific task by the President of the United States. Dr. Johnson is responsible to no one but the President and has no incentive but the development of the truth; and when such an authority treats the Panama Canal as a proposition of sense and not of sentiment, and as the result of his long, patient, and scientific study of the question, recommends the payment of tolls upon domestic equally with foreign commerce, the laity may well give pause and consideration to his views.

TRAFFIC AVAILABLE ON OPENING OF CANAL.

Dr. Johnson estimates that upon the opening of the Panama Canal there will be an available annual traffic of 10,500,000 tons; that approximately only one-tenth of this volume will consist of coast-to-coast traffic, or a little more than 1,000,000 tons, although there will be in movement at that time more than 4,000,000 tons of coast-to-coast traffic, from which it follows that the railroads will continue to handle approximately three-fourths of the coast-to-coast traffic, although it is estimated by Interstate Commerce Commissioners that more than 90 per cent of the coast-to-coast traffic will be competitive in character; that is to say, traffic which may move either by land or water. I shall insert at this point a partial but interesting and instructive analysis of Dr. Johnson's estimates as made by members of the committee during his testimony:

Mr. KNOWLAND. I would like to ask regarding that 10,500,000 tons, how much of that do you figure would be coast-to-coast commerce?

Dr. JOHNSON. The Panama traffic of 1910 is put down at 418,000 tons net register. The American-Hawaiian Steamship Co.'s traffic is credited with 363,000 tons, and there are 172,000 tons of traffic through the Strait of Magellan. The total would be 950,000 tons net register.

Mr. KNOWLAND. About 11 per cent?

Dr. JOHNSON. Yes, sir; a little over 11 per cent.

Mr. KNOWLAND. A very small proportion?

Dr. JOHNSON. Very small. One reason for thinking that these figures may prove conservative in future years is that very soon after the opening of the canal there should be a very large increase in the coast-to-coast movement of American traffic.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you figured what portion of it would be foreign commerce of American ports?

Dr. JOHNSON. Over half of this total here consists of foreign commerce that would not touch the shores of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. I asked you what per cent of it represents the foreign commerce of the ports of the United States, ships that touch at the ports of the United States and foreign countries, is not that the large bulk of the commerce we may expect?

Dr. JOHNSON. I find that 33.8 per cent of the total trade available for the canal in 1909–10 consisted of the foreign commerce of the United States.

Mr. KNOWLAND. These figures for 1915—950,000 tons—are exclusively coast to coast from American port to American port?

Dr. JOHNSON. Yes, sir; 1909 and 1910.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Of the 950,000 tons, 418,000 is via Panama?

Dr. JOHNSON. That is Panama traffic. The American-Hawaiian Steamship Co. had 363,426 tons net register of Tehuantepec traffic, and there were 172,655 tons net via the Strait of Magellan, making in all some over 950,000 tons net, or 11 per cent.

Mr. STEVENS. You have made no estimate here of the traffic that may be taken away from the transcontinental railroads by the canal.

Dr. JOHNSON. I have not referred to that. The statistical tables do not make any conjectures as to what will be taken away from the railroads or as to what the growth of the coastwise business will be after the opening of the canal. We have preferred to keep on the basis of solid facts and simply refer to the limitations of the data presented.

Mr. STEVENS. What was the estimate of coast-to-coast business over the transcontinental lines and other lines, as shown by the testimony before the Interstate Commerce Commission in the Long-and-short-haul cases?

Dr. JOHNSON. About 3,000,000 tons.

Mr. STEVENS. What would that amount to in 1915 if the same ratio of increase were taken which you estimate—about 6 per cent a year?

OVER 90 PER CENT OF TRAFFIC COMPETITIVE.

Dr. JOHNSON. I assume those figures for 3,000,000 cargo tons by rail must have been for a period as early as 1908, and that would mean a period of seven years. I should say the increase would be over 40 per cent, which would thus be 4,200,000, or four and a half million tons, possibly. Of course, the committee will understand we are now talking about tons of 2,000 pounds, not vessel tons.

Mr. STEVENS. I am speaking of cargo tons shown by testimony that existed, say in 1908, and by the same estimate will exist for transportation in 1915, which should be an amount probably in excess of 4,000,000 tons. Now it is estimated by quite a number who have testified here, Mr. Dearborn and Mr. Skinner and others, that there will be a substantial reduction of rates on the coast-to-coast business due to water transportation. If that be true, have you any judgment as to what proportion of that could be taken by water rather than by rail? Now, this is just a matter of conjecture entirely, outside of your——

Dr. JOHNSON. The traffic men say there is comparatively little traffic that may not theoretically move by water, as well as by rail, west bound.

Mr. STEVENS. What did Commissioner Lane say?

Dr. JOHNSON. I think all but about 7½ per cent consisted of traffic which might not move by water.

Mr. STEVENS. So over 90 per cent of the traffic is competitive in character?

Dr. JOHNSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEVENS. So if it can be made competitive in rates and facilities, have you any estimate as to the amount which might be carried by water?

Dr. JOHNSON. I do not think any traffic expert will venture to make an estimate, because it is not the rate which controls the route taken so much as it is the character of the service performed. It often happens that a shipper may prefer a higher rate by a rail line which takes his goods from his shop or warehouse and delivers them to the factory, store, or warehouse of the consignee without cartage and without transfer; I think only experience can demonstrate the actual division of this competitive traffic between the water and rail routes.

Mr. HAMLIN. I understand that 950,000 tons, in round numbers, is the estimate for 1909 and 1910?

Dr. JOHNSON. Yes; and of course that is effected by the 26 per cent increase to 1914–15.

Mr. HAMLIN. For instance, in making your 10,500,000 tons estimate, how much of it is the coast-to-coast business?

Dr. JOHNSON. Of that ten and a half million tons, 1,160,000.

Mr. HAMLIN. Then, in other words, of the 10,500,000 tons estimated for 1915 but 1,160,000 tons is coast to coast?

Dr. JOHNSON. Less than one and a quarter millions.

Mr. HAMLIN. So that in the total revenue it is very small?

Dr. JOHNSON. Your statement is correct. But the traffic moving from coast to coast in 1914, at the time of the opening of the canal, may and probably will be larger than that. The American-Hawaiian Steamship Co. will have a fleet whose passage through the canal will add 500,000 tons to the net register tonnage of canal traffic.

BUSINESS METHODS IN FIXING PANAMA TOLLS, AND WHY.

While acknowledging the Panama Canal to be a great military and naval asset, we are reminded by Dr. Johnson that—

It will not be that without a large addition to our already heavy military expenses—

And that its protection—will involve an annual outlay little, if any, less than the cost of operating the canal and paying interest on the investment.

And these two items, by the way, total the snug sum of not less than $16,000,000 annually, to meet which will require just the present traffic of the Suez Canal, which it has been 40 years in developing, at $1 per net ton.

So Dr. Johnson would treat the canal as a business proposition, quoting from the message of the President to Congress on December 21, 1911, as follows:

I believe that the cost of such a Government work as the Panama Canal ought to be imposed gradually but certainly upon the trade which it creates and makes possible. So far as we can, consistent with the development of the world's trade through the canal, and the benefit which it was intended to secure to the east and west coastwise trade, we ought to labor to secure from the canal tolls a sufficient amount ultimately to meet the debt which we have assumed and to pay the interest.

Continuing, Dr. Johnson says:

Considered as a commercial highway, the canal may logically be managed so as to yield a revenue that will cover operating expenses, interest on the investment, and eventually the amortization of the principal of the canal debt—

And that—

The evidence, both as to the volume of probable traffic and as to the ability of the Panama Canal to compete with alternative routes, indicates that tolls can be imposed which will neither burden nor unwisely restrict commerce and which will yield revenues large enough to meet the running expenses of the canal and, to quote the President's words, "ultimately to meet the debt which we have assumed."

The tolls at Panama need not be heavy. They need not exceed 5 or 6 per cent of the average freight charge paid by shippers on traffic using the canal. I suppose it will be agreed by everyone that a Panama toll equivalent to 50 or 60 cents per ton of cargo in the ship, cargo upon which the freight rate will average $10 per ton, will not be a high charge.

The canal will cost the United States $375,000,000, much of which sum has been, or will be, secured by borrowing money. The interest and principal of this debt must be paid either from funds secured by general taxes or from the revenues derived from canal tolls. Being a nation of practical people, it is probable that we shall adhere to sound business principles in the operation of the canal and in levying tolls.

FREE TOLLS NOT NEEDED.

That the payment of the moderate charge suggested by Dr. Johnson will not impair the canal as a competitor of the transcontinental railroads and that relieving shipowners of its payment would inure but little to the consumer is made clear in the following discussion:

Mr. COVINGTON. This morning in your testimony you said that toll charges on the canal will have no effect on commerce moving from the Atlantic to the Pacific ports of the United States, or the reverse, except in so far as the toll will be such as to secure freight which would otherwise move from one coast to the other by rail. What effect will that condition have upon the necessity for preferential rates to be given to the coastwise trade of the United States?

Dr. JOHNSON. The advantage to the commerce of the United States by relieving the coastwise carriers of Panama Canal tolls would, in my judgment, be slight. First, I think the toll will be a comparatively light burden to be borne, and, second, I think the burden, such as it is, will be borne by the steamship companies, whose rates may be expected to be adjusted with reference to the railroad rates and thus will not be upon a ruinously low basis. From the point of view of American commerce there is little, if anything, to be gained by relieving the coastwise carriers of the payment of reasonable tolls. Do I answer your question?

Mr. COVINGTON. That answers it to an extent. I believe I understood you to say this morning, in answer to some one, that there would be practically no necessity for preferential rates in favor of American vessels to induce American commerce to use the Panama Canal route as a means of transportation of freight from the one coast to the other.

Dr. JOHNSON. I believe that to be true. I was not aware that I said it, but I think it is a fact.

Mr. COVINGTON. I may have gathered that impression from——

Dr. JOHNSON. In other words, the opening of the Panama Canal will largely increase the possible commerce between our two seaboards, and the law in the trade world is that the demand for facilities is met by the creation of a supply of facilities. I see no reason to doubt that, if there is an active demand for more shipping between our two seaboards, the demand will be met. If we maintain our present navigation laws, that demand will be met by American capital building ships in American yards. If we open our coast-to-coast business to foreign shipping, of course the demand will be met almost entirely by the use of ships built abroad, as far as new ships are needed to meet the demand.

ONLY EXTREMELY HIGH TOLLS WOULD AFFECT THE CANAL.

Perhaps no more effective statement, considered in the light of the surrounding circumstances, could be made upon the question of the effect of tolls upon domestic shipping than that made by Dr. Johnson at the outset of his discussion of the effect of tolls upon traffic. In his usual scientific and systematic way he had divided the world's water traffic, leaving out the domestic traffic, into six sections. In his exhaustive discussion Dr. Johnson at no time suggested as high a rate as the present Suez rate of $1.30 per net ton and usually no higher than $1. Bearing in mind, then, that Dr. Johnson had in view the Suez rate and his own repeated illustrative figure of $1 per ton, he said:

It is not necessary to consider the effect of tolls upon the traffic through the Panama Canal between the north Atlantic and the west coast of North America, because that is commerce over which the Panama Canal has an absolute monopoly, and tolls much higher than could be borne elsewhere would have no effect in diverting traffic from the canal. The only effect of extremely high tolls would be to keep traffic to the rails, instead of allowing it to go by water.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the only way tolls can materially affect the coastwise trade in so far as they may be affected by competition with the transcontinental railways?

Dr. JOHNSON. Yes; that is so.

This is only another way of stating the same fact had in mind by the Secretary of War, when he said that "In one respect the coastwise trade has less need of a canal subsidy than our foreign trade."

It is secured by a Government monopoly from water competition and could be affected only by such high tolls as would prevent it from competing with land transportation, and Dr. Johnson had no such rates in mind when speaking as above. And he not only had in mind, but had mentioned, rates the sum total of which upon the vessel cargo will be small indeed in comparison either with the present cost of rounding the Horn or of hauling to the Panama or Tehuantepec railways in one vessel, transferring to the rail, then to another vessel. The toll will be but a minor part of the saving to the ship's owner, as clearly shown by the testimony, and it would be pandering to sentiment, not adhering to sense, to make this moiety also a bonus to an unregulated shipping combine. I do not believe it will be done.

OBJECTS OF THE CANAL.

There are those who, seizing upon everything as a peg upon which to hang an argument for free tolls, point to the increased efficiency of the Navy as a justification for charging the canal up entirely to the national defense. It is an inadequate view of the canal, not sustained by history, to even connect it until very recent times with the military defense of the United States.

There are those who regard the canal as primarily an instrument of commerce between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of the United States. But this view is no older than the discovery of gold in California, and Tracy Robinson, in his history of Panama, quotes another authority to the effect that at and prior to the time of the construction of the first transcontinental railway across the United States the Pacific coast of the United States was furnishing the Panama railroad one-sixteenth of its traffic. So this position is also inadequate.

My views upon the question of tolls are not determined primarily by either of these considerations. It has been the dream of navigation since the circumnavigation of the American Continent to pierce the Isthmus with a shipway. When this dream first troubled the mind of man neither coast of the United States was known even to exist. The dream was to pierce the narrow neck that stood as a barrier against ships which would sail to the unknown lands beyond the sunset and the seas. The dream was to make a gateway to the East.

Then, as civilization spread from the very spot where the canal is now building, up and down the shores of the two oceans, the Isthmus became increasingly a barrier to intercourse between the coasts, until to-day it is a universal obstruction; and the dream, now about to be realized, is the severing of two continents and the opening of a new highway on the seas, for the benefit not merely of the two coasts of one country or for a handful of shipowners, but of all the world.

There is a noble basis in sentiment for the contention of John Barrett that it should be treated as a natural waterway, free in every sense of the word to the vessels of the world. But it is going to be the most expensive waterway in the world to maintain as well as to construct; and since it can not be universally free, the next best and most unselfish thing to do is to equally distribute, among all the vessels of the world, the cost of maintaining it.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP].

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I have always understood that the Panama Canal was constructed for a purpose other than the one to which some of the gentlemen on this floor have attempted to dedicate it. I understood at the inception of the agitation for the Panama Canal that it was not a mere local affair, as these coastwise-trade gentlemen seem to have in mind, but that it was a great international affair; that it was to be constructed not for the purpose of carrying the products and commodities of the United States from coast to coast alone, but that it was to give an outlet for the surplus of the products of the United States to other countries throughout the world, open their markets and make them accessible to our people, and thereby dispose of our surplus and accelerate our production; that after we had supplied the wants of our people at home and had a surplus to put upon the markets of the world, by the construction of the Panama Canal we could send them to other countries cheaper and in less time and compete with other countries successfully. This was the primary purpose for the construction of the Panama Canal. This great object made the construction of it possible. And yet the gentlemen to-day who are advocating here free ships through the canal for the coast-to-coast trade are diverting this great commercial artery of commerce to a mere local purpose from its original international object. It was never intended, when the treaty was made, that any discrimination should be made in favor of vessels passing through the Panama Canal carrying articles from one coast to the other. That is a mere afterthought which has been injected into this proposition by selfish interests and by gentlemen who believe in subsidizing the ships of this country. It is another form of subvention or ship subsidy, and the argument made here for it to-day is merely a subterfuge to divert the attention of the people of the country from the real object of the measure they propose. It is a ship subsidy in a new costume.

I desire to call the attention of the committee, to sustain the proposition that it was never intended to make any discrimination between the coastwise trade and other trade, to an amendment which was offered in the Senate at the time of the ratification of the treaty, and the construction that was put upon it then by the United States Senate and the construction that went out to the entire world it should have; and I want to know now, after that construction has remained upon that treaty for 11 years, has been so published to the world, has been acquiesced in by this Nation, whether we are acting in good faith if we now place a different construction upon it at the behest of selfish interests and to serve only certain localities of the United States. Shall it be diverted from its world-wide purpose and localized? Can a great Nation, the most powerful in the world, now change the construction from the one that was placed on this instrument 10 years ago, when the treaty was confirmed in the United States Senate? If it is done, what will be our position in the estimation of the great powers of the earth? On this very question I desire to call attention that at the time when the United States Senate was construing the treaty in question to mean the same as Secretary Hay had construed it when it was made—that no discrimination could be made—Senator Bard, of California, in the Senate contended that the discrimination ought to be made and offered an amendment for that purpose as follows:

ART. III. The United States reserves the right in the regulation and management of the canal to discriminate in respect to the charges on traffic in favor of vessels of its own citizens in the coastwise trade.

This amendment was voted down by a vote of 27 to 43. Thus it placed its construction upon it.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLOP. I have but a limited time, and I must decline to yield for that reason only. Certainly when this identical question was under discussion and if then it was the construction put upon this provision of the treaty, language which was entirely free from ambiguity, that construction should not be changed now, but should be observed. If that was not the proper construction, what must have been the position of the Senator who offered that kind of an amendment to the treaty? It would be a reflection on him to hold otherwise. When the vote was taken there were 27 in favor of incorporating that provision in the treaty and 43 against it. This ought to convince every man of the true construction given it by that body at the time it was made. The sentiment was almost two to one that no discrimination should be made, and that sentiment ought to prevail here and now. Yet, as I said before, when the Panama Canal is about to be completed, when the people of this country, not only on the coasts, but in the interior of the country, have poured $400,000,000 of their hard-earned money into the construction of this canal, selfish interest to-day comes in and wants to repudiate the treaty under which it was built and say to the world, we are changing this treaty and now construe it differently.

Mr. DOREMUS. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. CULLOP. I have not the time; if I had I would be very glad to do so, and I would like to debate it with any man who takes the other position. Now, the question is, Shall we be guilty of repudiating the position that was taken when the treaty was written by the authorized representative of the United States delegated to make it and by the United States Senate when it confirmed it? Shall we repudiate that provision after it has stood unquestioned for 11 years and every nation of the world has been notified that such was the construction that this country placed upon it? I ask gentlemen when they come to vote upon this question, Are they willing to repudiate the position that their country has taken from the time this treaty was made down to the present hour? If that provision was open to the construction that is sought to be put upon it here to-day by selfish interests, who want to gain an advantage in the use of this great artery of commerce, what would be the position of the United States before the great powers of the earth hereafter when other great international questions are to be settled and set forth to the world? Can this House, can the Senate, or could the Executive indorse a measure that would turn down the position of this country for 11 years upon that proposition? But some gentlemen have said that the Suez Canal is operated in this or that way. Let me say to those gentlemen that the operation of the Suez Canal is not a parallel to this proposition at all. It is a private corporation; it is not owned by any Government on the face of the earth. The Suez Canal has its principal office at Paris; it was built by purchase of stock as a private enterprise and has always been so operated. I will read the part of the hearings bearing on that matter, which will clear up that question and remove all doubt on that subject:

Up to December 31, 1910, the Suez Canal, with its accessories, improvements, and extensions, represented a total investment from the beginning of 656,178,271 francs, or $126,642,406.35, almost exactly one-third of the estimated cost of the Panama Canal on the day when it shall be opened to commerce. The Suez Canal is almost exactly twice the length of the Panama Canal, but the flat, sandy soil of Egypt presents none of the obstacles which engineering at Panama by deep cuts and massive locks has mastered. The stock of the corporation consists of 379,421 shares of a par value of 500 francs ($96.50).
